FAD GRISIS

Activists of environmental organization Greenpeace unfurl a huge anti-war banner at the Michael gate of the Vienna landmark the Hofburg castle during a protest against the US-led war against Iraq, late Thursday

Blair urges Britons to unite behind troops

AFP, London

Prime Minister Tony Blair urged Britons to unite behind the country's troops late Thursday, and announced that British forces were carrying out land operations against Iraq.

In a sombre, five-minute speech, his first public statement on the war, Blair bluntly warned Britons that war was the only real option against President Saddam Hussein's "barbarous" and dangerous regime.

"British servicemen and women are engaged from air, land and sea. Fheir mission: to remove Saddam Hussein from power, and disarm Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction," said the prime minister.

Blair is US President George W. Bush's staunchest ally on Iraq, having sent 45,000 soldiers, sailors and airmen, 120 tanks, a 17-ship naval task force and more than 100 warplanes to the Gulf.

British Royal Marine commandos launched an amphibious assault on Iraqi positions in the south of the country Thursday, securing a foothold for an advance on Baghdad, a journalist from The Times embedded with the force reported.

With US troops, the elite soldiers pushed into the Fao peninsula, a vital oil export sea route for Iraq, southeast of the city of Basra, while others made beach landings and cleared Iraqi mines on land and at sea, said journalist David Sharrock in a pooled dispatch printed Friday.

Meanwhile, the defence ministry confirmed that British Royal Navy submarines fired Cruise missiles at "command and control targets" in Baghdad Thursday, in a coordinated attack with US forces.

A ministry spokesman would not reveal the number of submarines nvolved, their location, or the number of missiles fired.

In Britain, however, there remains strong opposition to the war, and it was evident Thursday in demonstrations in central London and in cities up and down the country.

AFP, Geneva

The Baily Star DHAKA SATURDAY MARCH 22, 2003

Blair acknowledged in his speech on the war: "I know this course of action has produced deep divisions of opinion in our country.

The prime minister said, however, that "vast amounts" of chemical and biological poisons, such as anthrax, VX nerve agent, and mustard gas, remained unaccounted for in Iraq.

"So our choice is clear: back down and leave Saddam hugely strength ened; or proceed to disarm him by force.

He added: "I hope the Iraqi people hear this message. We are with you. Our enemy is not you, but your barbarous rulers.

The Guardian daily reported Friday that Blair had been informed but not consulted by Washington on the timing of strikes on Baghdad early Thursday which heralded the start of the war.

In Britain, during a day of anti-war demonstrations, police arrested 20 people for public order offences in Parliament Square, central London, and at one point pulled out their truncheons to keep bottle-throwing demonstrators from surging down Whitehall towards Downing Street.

"One, two, three, four, we don't want your bloody war! Five, six, seven, eight, stop the killing, stop the hate!" a group of about 30 children were heard chanting, borrowing a slogan from Vietnam war days.

The Stop the War Coalition, organisers of a major demonstration through London streets this Saturday, said the outbreak of war was "a day of shame for Britain."

In the Scottish capital Edinburgh, 2,500 people took to the streets, causing gridlock on the roads, protesters said, while in the northwestern English city of Manchester, 2,000 people marched through the centre.

Britain reopens rift in EU

REUTERS, Brussels

Britain said on Friday it stood by charges that France had prevented a peaceful settlement of the Iraq crisis, reopening European divi-sions midway through a tense, two-day summit of EU leaders. Britain, which has committed 45,000 troops to the US-led Iraqi campaign, accuses France, leader of the anti-war camp, of ruining diplomatic moves to avert conflict by threatening to veto any UN Security Council resolution.

The 15 European Union leaders managed to paper over their differ-ences on Thursday night with a lowest common denominator agreement that backed U.N. humanitarian efforts in postwar Iraq and warned Iraq's neighboUrs not to make mischief

But British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, asked whether he regretted attacks on France that with Blair. drew an angry protest from his French counterpart, said on Friday: "I stand by the words I have used. "I don't regret the fact that we have argued, that we disagree with the French position, because we do," he told British reporters on the second day of the EU summit.

Relations between Britain and France have sunk to their frostiest r years over Iraq, but Straw said he hoped the differences would not spill over into other EU issues.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, looking tired and drawn after Britain suffered its first casualties of the war in a helicopter crash, was seen shaking hands and chatting briefly with German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, another vocal opponent of military action, ahead of Friday's talks on the economy.

Chirac entered the room only after cameras had been ushered out, avoiding being photographed no plans for the two men to hold a private meeting during the sum-mit. They spoke only sparingly in Thursday's Iraq debate, witnesses said. "There is a correct tone of voice, but you feel in the air that the atmosphere is tense," Swedish Prime Minister Goran Persson said on Thursday night.

In their statement, the EU leaders could not agree to say who was responsible for the war or whether Iraq had missed a final opportunity to disarm before US-led forces attacked on Thursday. "We call on all countries of the region to refrain from actions that could lead to further instability,' their joint statement said. Diplomats said the message was aimed at EU candidate Turkey, which has refused to let US troops invade Iraq from its soil but cleared the way for thousands of its own soldiers to move into northern

PHOTO: AFP

The statement also called for a central role for the United Nations in humanitarian aid and the post war order.

This could cause friction with the United States, which diplomats said wants a very circumscribed UN mandate that would not tie its hands as the occupying power in Iraq.

The leaders stressed their commitment to strengthening transatlantic relations, severely strained by the crisis.

Kurds

EU Commissioner for External Affairs Chris Patten said the diplomatic fallout from the war could be substantial.

"I'm worried about the collateral political damage that has been produced. Damage to the European Union, to NATO, to transatlantic relations, to our relations with the Arab world and the United Nations," he told the

Iraqis in US AFP, Washington

The FBI said Thursday that its agents are on the trail of Iraqis in the United States, seeking informa-tion about terrorist attacks that Baghdad might contemplate in reprisal for a US-led attack.

FBI interviewing

"We are running down every lead, responding to every threat, coordinating with every partner, and doing our utmost to keep terrorists from striking back," Federal Bureau of Investigation director Robert Mueller said in a statement

The operation, dubbed Liberty Shield, is meant to protect US lives and infrastructure.

The task, Mueller said, involves "sending Special Agents to inter-view a number of Iraqi-born indi-viduals and others in the US to assure them of the FBI's responsi-bility to protect them from hate crimes and to elicit information on any potential operations of Iraqi agents or sympathizers," Mueller to keep borders open

The UN's top refugee official Ruud Lubbers on Thursday urged Iraq's neighbour states to keep their borders open to refugees fleeing the US-led war in Iraq.

"We must do everything we can to alleviate suffering (for the Iraqi people), including keeping borders open so that those fearing for their lives can reach safety in neighbour-ing states, "the High the High Commissioner for refugees told reporters.

The UN refugee agency (UNHCR) has also asked for unlimited access to Iraq's border regions for emergency teams to monitor the flow of refugees and protect their rights.

"We have people and resources in the region, and more are arriving every day. But to save lives, we must have open borders and access to all of those seeking temporary asylum," Lubbers said.

UN urges Iraq's neighbours

The UNHCR has asked Iraq's neighbours to offer their assistance UNHCR has made contingency to Iraqi refugees. plans for 600,000 refugees leaving "UNHCR is doing all it can to Iraq in the event of war. assist these neighbouring govern-UNHCR has estimated that it ments in meeting their primary responsibility to provide refugees with temporary protection and material assistance," the commis-sioner added. would need about 154 million dollars (144 million euros) to provide shelter for those refugees over a six-month period.

Jordan.

To date it has received just 21 million dollars from donors, and "Despite all of the UN's efforts to find a peaceful solution, we are has already had to dip into emernow faced with the sad reality of gency reserves to meet expendiwar in Iraq and more suffering for people in a number of locations including Iskenderun in Turkey,

Kermanshah in Iran, and Aqaba in

The Geneva-based office of the

"We also expect the interna-tional community to do its part by The UN refugee agency currently has more than 200 staff in the supporting humanitarian efforts region and has stockpiled emerthroughout the region," Lubbers 300.000 said the Iraqi people," he said.

Panic-stricken Kuwaitis flee city

REUTERS, Kuwait City

Kuwait, where over 100,000 US and British troops are primed for a ground invasion, came under surprise missile attack from Iraq Thursday, plunging the country into a panic not seen since the 1991 GulfWar.

Residents in Iraq's southern neighbour scrambled for gas masks and chemical warfare suits and headed for makeshift shelters as air raid sirens wailed repeatedly amid fears of chemical attack from Baghdad's snap retaliation to predawn US air strikes.

None of the six Iraqi missiles the defence ministry said were fired from across the border was known to have caused any casualties but two were intercepted by Patriot missiles, one over Kuwait Bay on the northern rim of the city.

Normal broadcasting on state television was interrupted and a rotating air raid siren appeared every time a missile was incoming, with a warning of danger and an instruction to citizens not to venture outside.

Sirens began wailing in short bursts from around 12:30 pm for about an hour as news emerged that the first missile had been fired on PHOTO: AFF Kuwaitis flee the city and pack the southbound freeway bumper-to-bumper as they drive out of Kuwait City for safer havens on Thursday.

northern Kuwait, where the majority of the U.S. and British forces ranged against Saddam have set up

Police cars flanked by armoured vehicles were also seen cruising the streets, broadcasting the same message by loud hailer

The sirens prompted motorists to speed off in the direction of their homes while other citizens were seen walking around with gas masks.

After months of often bland reassurance that Iraq had little if any of its once-feared arsenal left, many residents complained they were not receiving enough information on events and few had any idea of the location of the closest air shelters.

Shockwaves were felt around the capital with every attack, and each time the sirens wailed, phone lines jammed. The streets of the capital were largely deserted on what is the first day of the weekend for government employees.

The few stores which were open were doing brisk business in protective equipment and emergency previsions

Special Kuwaiti security forces are deployed all over the country and road blocks set up along the main coastal road. Police cars flanked by armoured vehicles were also seen cruising the streets, broadcasting the same message by loud hailer. Of the six missiles fired at Kuwait, the last two were longerrange Scuds but the first four had a medium-range, Colonel Yussif Al Mulla, a Kuwait defence ministry spokesman, said on state-run television.

Speculation focused on Iraq's banned Al Samoud 2 missiles, which UN weapons inspectors were destroying before the disarmament mission halted ahead of vesterday's attack on Baghdad. The last two missiles were both intercepted over the country by Patriot missiles, while the first two crashed into the Mutlaa desert, 40km north of Kuwait, around 10:30 am, the defence ministry said.

Some two hours later, the ministry announced that three more missiles had hit Kuwait. The sirens sounded again and the ministry said a sixth missile had struck. The latest siren alert, at around 3:30 pm, turned out to be a false alarm, Mulla said

WFP prepares for crisis

BBC NEWS ONLINE

The United Nations food agency, believing that it may be facing the largest and most costly humanitarian crisis in history, is making contingency plans to feed the people of Iraq.

In New York, the UN Secretary General is seeking immediate authorisation from the Security Council to take over the agency's oil-for-food programme.

It has been jointly administered until now by Baghdad and the UN.

The programme, which has been in operation since 1996, collapsed with the outbreak of war and the evacuation of UN personnel, leaving 60 per cent of Iraqis without access to fresh food. crisis

Officials at the World Food So far the UN agency has stockpiled about 30.000 tonnes of food Programme (WFP) headquarters in in countries bordering Irag - that is Rome are deeply concerned. enough to feed two million people

Under their new plan Iraq's oil revenues are channelled into a UN bank account from which Saddam Hussein has been paying for food, medicine and other basic necessities for the civilian population.

The programme avoids the UN trade embargo imposed after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990.

in reserve.

WFP officials say the Iraqis have The final cost could be more only about six weeks' food supplies than $1bn.

for one month.

within days.

Meanwhile, in Geneva, another Their warehouses are almost UN agency, the High Commission empty and unless very large quanfor Refugees, has appealed to Iraq's neighbours to keep their borders tities of food reach Iraq soon, there could be a devastating hunger open to people fleeing the war.

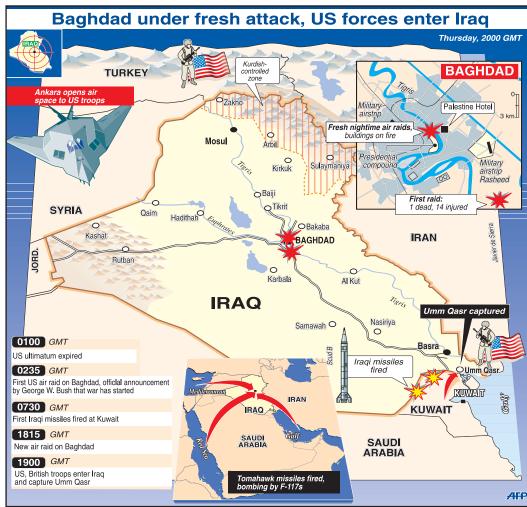

But Iraq's population is 26 million and if the war drags on, in a month's time the agency might have to feed the entire population.

tonnes of food have to be ordered

Hundreds of thousands of US envisions radical change in world order

AFP, Washington

Washington sees the war on Iraq as the first stage of a radical change in international order, including acceptance of the concept of "preventive war," the "reshaping" of the Middle East, and a reshuffling of traditional alliances.

Many US officials close to the so-called "neo-conservatives" now moving to the fore in President George W. Bush's entourage have long seen the Iraqi conflict as inevitable and have been working toward redrawing the world political map.

This school of thought, the object of heavy criticism both abroad and in liberal American circles for its unilateral tendencies, wants to put the United States at the center of a new post-cold war order, unshackled from the inherited burden of treaties and international institutions.

Its most noted proponents are vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary

Donald Rumsfeld and his deputy, Paul Wolfowitz. Numerous advisors in the White House, Pentagon and State Department also share that vision of a new world order. Even Secretary of State Colin Powell. a reputed moderate long wedded to classic multilateralism, has in recent months evolved in this direction, notably talking of a "reshaping" of the Middle East.

Bush has on numerous occasions bolstered the voices of the neo-conservatives, notably in rejecting the Kyoto Protocol on global warming, and in pulling out of the US-Russian anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty in order to pursue his anti-missile shield plans.

In January 1998, 18 noted Republicans, half of whom today hold top posts, had already sent an open letter to then president Bill Clinton proposing the course of action his predecessor has now taken against Iraq.

The 18 urged Clinton to "enunciate a new strategy that would secure the interests of the US and our friends and allies around the

"That strategy should aim, above all, at the removal of Saddam Hussein's regime from power," said the letter.

They also urged that US policy on Iraq not be shackled by the United Nations, a policy today being embraced by Bush.

US officials see three main new concepts coming into play:

-- The idea of "preventive war," put forth by Bush last year as a central pillar of US defense against threats from terroristfriendly "rogue states" like Iraq, Iran and North Korea.

-- the reshaping of the Middle East, or the so-called theory of "democratic dominos," which assumes the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime will trigger a move toward democracy in other countries of the region, and, notably facilitating peace between Israel and the Palestinians

-- New alliances. Figuring that major institutions like the United Nations and NATO have demonstrated their limitations, and disappointed by traditional US allies like France and Germany, Washington wants to develop "coalitions of the willing," more pliable, less restrained and more inclined to support against Iraq that Washington sought but failed to get from UN Security Council.

Many foreign officials and commentators began Thursday, the morning after the war on Iraq began, to denounce Washington's "unilateralist vision," fearing the conflict was proof only of a desire to dominate, to the detriment of the United Nations.

rally around the United States. Tried out with the "anti-terrorist coalition" formed after the September 11 2001 attacks, this idea is getting legs today with the "coalition for the immediate disarmament of Iraq," serving as the international mantle of