grounded in first week of war

AFP, Southwest Iraq

Desert storms that have rained mud, reduced visibility to just a few centimetres (inches) and sent wind gusts of 50 knots through southern Iraq have rendered the US army's elite air assault division useless in the first week of war against Saddam Hussein's regime.

The 20-million-dollar Apache helicopters are supposed to be the stars of the 101st Airborne Division, with their Hellfire missile capabilities making them the first choice to take out the Republican Guard's tanks and other heavy armour.

But seven days into the war, the Apaches and other helicopters that make up the division's 270-strong fleet, the Black Hawks, Chinooks and Kiowa Warriors, have seen no combat action.

Sitting in a tent thick with fine dust at the division's forward operating has the next while dust at the dust of a forward operating base in southwest Iraq on Wednesday, the division's aviation brigade commander, Colonel Greg Gass, told AFP the weather had played a major role in forcing the helicopters to remain grounded.

"We have got out here and we have got our stuff on the ground. We have got everything we need to exact the mission so I feel good about that. But the weather is absolutely horrid and it's certainly a factor," Gass said.

"In this weather you can't fly. You can't even drive in this."

However, Gass said the division had spent the week ensuring they were ready to join the conflict as soon as the wind dropped.

"We are pretty much where we want to be at this time. We are saying there's a new butcher of Baghdad.

Long an epithet for Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in the West, Arab newspapers and citi-zens said pictures of burned bodies and pools of blood in a busy Baghdad neighbourhood proved the name was more suitable for the American government.

"Massacre in Baghdad" screamed a headline in Lebanon's daily as-Safir on Thursday after two explosions devastated a street in the Iraqi capital and killed as many as 15 people. Iraqis called it a U.S. attack, while the U.S. military suggested it might have been a stray Iraqi anti-aircraft missile or sabotage.

Egypt's al-Ahrar condemned e "American slaughter of civilians," while Morocco's L'Opinion called the blasts a "murderous raid," and Palestinian newspaper al-Hayat al-Jadida mourned the "savage bombardment" of Baghdad.

Biman flies to Kuwait again

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

After a break of eight days, Bangladesh Biman resumed its Kuwait-bound flights yesterday.

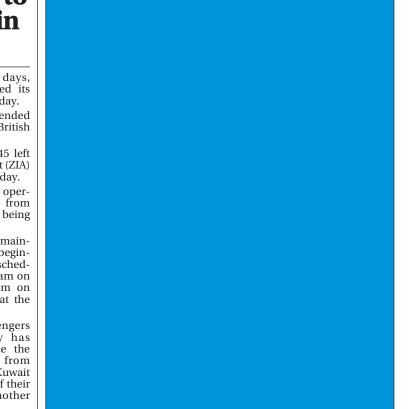

The flights were suspended after invasion of Iraq by US-British forces on March 20.

Biman's flight No. BG045 left the Zia International Airport (ZIA) for Bahrain at 3:25 am yesterday.

Kuwait Airways, which operates four flights a week from Dhaka to Kuwait, are also being delayed due to the war.

"Kuwait Airways is not maintaining its schedule since beginning of the war. Its flight scheduled to land at ZIA at 8:25 am on March 25 reached at 7 pm on March 26," said a source at the ZIA.

The number of passengers bound for Kuwait City has decreased drastically since the war. "Flights operating from Dhaka to Saudi Arabia via Kuwait are carrying passengers half their capacities now," said another source.
