Energy prices pose inflation threat

French central banker says

AFP, Paris

Central bankers around the world are worried that high energy and raw materials prices might feed into overall inflation, the head of the French central bank Christian Nover said on Monday.

He also signalled that the ECB was likely to increase its key rates soon, as is widely expected.

Noyer, who as governor of the French bank sits on the monetary policy committee of the European Central Bank, told the Le Figaro newspaper that the rising price of oil "is bad for the world economy".

He said that alobalisation had had a favourable effect on prices for industrial products.

He continued: "But all central banks in the world fear that the rise (in the price of) energy and of raw materials will end up by spreading into overall prices for goods and services".

The balance between the supply of energy and of demand "does not justify this level of price which can be explanined by geopolitical tensions" It was "very difficult" to say whether or not these price levels would last.

So far. oil prices "have had moderate effects on world growth, which has remained dynamic, and on inflation", he said.

He also commented on a surge of property prices in France, saying that "the rise cannot continue at this rate because it would lead to households becoming overindebted and to a reversal of the market".

Nover said that the ECB was "going in the direction of a very progressive normalisation of monetary policy", thereby indicating that the European Central Bank was likely to raise its key interest rates when it next meets at the beginning of August.

The ECB is widely expected to continue tweaking up its rates and Nover said that most leading central banks were doing likewise.

"As most economies are working flat out, an adjustment of monetary policies which were extremely accommodating is considered necessary everywhere, including in Japan.'

Bernanke had expressed concern about economic growth moderating and said inflation remains contained, causing market players to scale back US interest rate expectations.

Market watchers were to pore over a series of US data this week for further clues over the outlook for American borrowing costs.

Concerns that the violence could have spread to major crudeproducing nations in the Middle East saw oil prices soar to all-time highs above 78 dollars earlier this month.

Washington has come under increasing pressure for bold action amid criticism it is stalling to allow Israel time to attempt to wipe out Hezbollah, which set off the conflict after seizing two Israeli soldiers on July 12.

London Brent struck a historic peak 78.18 dollars per barrel on July 17, while light sweet crude hit a record pinnacle of 78.40 dollars in New York on July 14.

Since striking the highs, crude futures have fallen in London and New York by around six percent. However, current crude prices remain some 20 percent higher than at the start of 2006. Meanwhile, the future outlook
