

WHAT ARE YOU DOING!!! A young man breezily crosses Pragati Sarani, as exasperated policemen rush to stop him, and passers-by gather to see a show. After a firestorm of protests following death of university student Abrar Ahmed near this very spot less than a year ago, authorities constructed a footbridge nearby. Although road medians have been warded off with ropes and bamboo, jaywalkers continue to flout traffic regulations, sometimes right in front of law enforcers. The photo was taken on Wednesday.

‘Amend University Ordinance of 1973’

BNP lawmaker demands at House to enforce uniform admission tests

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

BNP lawmaker Harunur Rashid yesterday in parliament demanded that the government amends the University Ordinance 1973 to “force” four leading public universities to follow the uniform admission tests from this year.

Speaking on a point of order, the opposition MP also urged Speaker Shirin Sharmin Chaudhury, who was presiding over the sitting at that time, to issue a ruling so that the government can introduce the uniform university admission tests from this year removing all barriers.

“Vice chancellors of 28 universities sat in a meeting on Tuesday. It’s a matter of concern that some VCs of major universities, including Dhaka University and Buet, are talking about the 1973 ordinance and showing their unwillingness to accept the uniform admission test,” he said, referring to media reports.

As per the ordinance, authorities of universities can make decision about their academic activities on their own.

According to media reports, Dhaka University, Bangladesh University of Engineering and Technology (Buet), Jahangirnagar University and Chittagong are

Limit trans-fat use to 2pc in all foods

Consumer rights activists urge govt

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Consumer rights activists at a discussion yesterday urged the government to limit the use of trans fat in all foods to maximum of two percent, and maintain the standard strictly as the substance is injurious for health.

They also detailed a nine-point demand, including ban on hydrogenated oil -- the major sources of trans fat, and formulation of a policy in this regard.

Industrially-produced trans-fatty acid, also known as trans fat, causes severe health risks -- such as increasing risks of cardiovascular disease and cancer. However, several foods in the country contain an excessive amount of the fat and there is no policy to control it, they said.

Consumers Association of Bangladesh (CAB), National Heart Foundation of Bangladesh (NHFB) and Progotir Jonno Gyan (PROGGA), in association with Global Health Advocacy Incubator (GHA), organised the discussion on the health risks of trans fat at Cirdap auditorium in the capital.

Speaking as chief guest, Industries Minister Nurul Majid Mahmud Humayun said the government is working on regulating the use of trans fats and planning to formulate a policy in this regard.

‘Don’t deport Rohingyas’

Global coalition urges Saudi Arabia

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT

Free Rohingya Coalition, a global platform of Rohingyas worldwide, has urged Saudi Arabia not to deport any Rohingyas until the genocide against Myanmar is over.

“Once the case is settled and peace prevails in Rakhing state of Myanmar, they will go back to their country of origin. At this moment, we urge Saudi authorities not to deport any Rohingyas -- either from the detention camps or outside in the Kingdom -- to Bangladesh,” said Free Rohingya Coalition Co-founder Nay San Lwin.

The urge comes as a Saudi delegation is in talks with Bangladesh authorities over the deportation of the Rohingyas from Saudi Arabia.

“This is a sensitive issue. We don’t want deportation for the sake of deportation. There are issues of security. We are talking about it,” said Mahir Abdul Rahman Gassim, Saudi Arabia’s Deputy Minister for International Affairs of the Ministry of Labor and Social Development.

He said this at a joint press briefing at the Economic Relations Division (ERD) in the capital yesterday, after a two-day meeting of the Joint Commission of Bangladesh and Saudi Arabia.

The meeting discussed a range of issues including Saudi investments in Bangladesh and the welfare and protection of Bangladeshi migrants in Saudi Arabia.

ERD Secretary Monowar Ahmed said the Rohingya issue was raised at the discussion.

“We took note of it. A few ministries are involved in the issue. We will discuss and then decide on the matter,” he told journalists, but did not mention the number of Rohingyas Saudi Arabia wants to deport.

According to media reports, Saudi Arabia wants to deport some 42,000 Rohingyas, who are carrying Bangladeshi passports.

Nay San Lwin said there are some 3 lakh Rohingyas living in Saudi Arabia. Around 1,600 of them were in detention camps in Jeddah. Of them, a few dozen were deported to Bangladesh last year.

“The Rohingyas living in Saudi Arabia are a source of livelihoods for their families back either in Bangladesh or Myanmar.

MIGRANT WORKERS IN LEBANON

470 to return home this week

JAMIL MAHMUD

Some 470 Bangladeshi migrant workers are set to return home this week from crisis-hit Lebanon, following applications for repatriation under a special programme announced by authorities. Many of them are desperate to return home, said officials and migrant workers living in the Arab country.

The returning migrant workers, including some physically ailing and more than 200 women -- will be the second batch of workers to be repatriated willingly since the programme was announced in September last year.

Six Air Arabia flights will carry the workers to Dhaka between February 15 and 23, said an official at the Bangladesh embassy in Beirut.

The first batch, comprising about 582 workers returned home in December last year, the official said.

Amid an economic meltdown, around 1.6 lakh Bangladeshi migrant workers are passing days in uncertainty in Lebanon, as many of them have either lost their jobs or remained unpaid over the last few months.

Of them, some 30,000 are undocumented, according to media reports.

Abdullah Al Mamun, first secretary at the labour welfare wing of the Bangladesh Mission in Beirut, said they have received about 3,683 applications in two phases since the special programme was announced.

Of those, 2,383 applications were received in September and about 1,300 more in February this year, he told this newspaper by phone.

Mamun, also head of chancery at the Beirut Mission, said they are expecting to receive about 1,200 more applications in the second phase which will bring the number of workers to be repatriated under the programme to nearly 5,000.

“Those who applied are now illegal residents [in Lebanon],” he added.

He said they are looking for a suitable place outside the embassy to run activities under the programme, as the embassy premises is not large enough to handle the rush of the workers.
