open letter to Gorbachev published in the newspaper Komsomolskaya Pravda.

Shatalin said the new government's economic projections for the coming year were fanciful and the 1991 budget approved by Parliament this month was "a pure fiction".

He said the budget, passed against a background of rapidly mounting inflation and shortages of basic goods, "Will bring sharp price rises, especially on Shatalin said the Soviet Union could not come through the crisis unless it had help from the West.

Without it, he said, "We will never create an effective market economy and we will never solve either current or longterm problems of our economic development."

Against a background of mounting alarm abroad over Gorbachev's swing to hardline policies, he said: "Euphoria in the West over our Perestroika has long ago evaporated, as I hope you know."

"Your present policies are making the West even more reserved. There can be no illusions on that score."

The letter provided rarely publicised details of the working of the Kremlin and a struggle under way for Gorbachev's
