Jansher, the world number one who lost the title last year to Australian Rodney Martin, was in superb form and had obviously overcome breathing problems which hit him in the high altitude of Johannesburg last week.

He was also clearly not worried about a local radio report which alleged he had been refused entry to a private club for training because he would not pay the entrance fee. The report also alleged racial overtones to the incident.

ROK to expel asylum-seeking Ethiopian runner

SEOUL, Sept 23: South Korea may expel an Ethiopian female track athlete who is seeking asylum in the United States, sports officials said Wednesday, reports AP.

Meseret Dekele, 17, in Scoul for the 4th World Junior Athletics Championships, is asking South Korean officials to help her seek asylum in the United States, said the officials at the Korea Track and Field Association.

An association official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said she was likely to be expelled.

And during that period of five years, seven months and one day he was only once extended to five games. On court he was supreme.

And off court he accepted his success with humility. The shy schoolboy who struggled to communicate when he appeared on the world circuit in 1980 became a magnificent ambassador for his sport and for his country.

Yet his entry into squash was born of tragedy. His elder brother Tossan

His entry on the world cir cuit was dramatic indeed as he reached the British Open final at his first attempt in 1981 when he was beaten by Australian Geoff Hunt.

Later that year Jahangir defeated Hunt in Toronto to become the youngest ever World Open champion at the age of 17. Less than six months later he won his first British Open.
