

ILO experts' reports say

Bangladesh's work force will be 20m by 2000

At least a billion jobs must be created worldwide in the next 10 years to prevent the gap between the poor and rich from widening, demographic experts have agreed in a series of published reports, BSS.

By 2025, the earth's population will have grown to 8.5 billion, against 5.5 billion today, and those of working age will have gone up to 3.7 billion from 2.4 billion.

Before the year 2000, Mexico's work force will have reached 18 million people, Bangladesh 20 million and Kenya 7.3 million.

Developing countries, where most of the population growth is taking place, will need to create 38 million jobs a year, only to keep abreast of people joining the job market, not taking into account the existing 40 per cent unemployed or under-employed.

In developing countries, between 50 and 60 per cent are employed in the unregulated sectors (street jobs, subsistence jobs and undeclared work in the black economy), without a decent income, according to a report by the International Labour Office. It estimated that 40 per cent of the populations of Latin America and the Caribbean live below the poverty line.

In Europe and North America, the population of working age is going up very little because of low birth rates. But unemployment has become critical: the 24 countries belonging to the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development are predicting 38 million unemployed in 1994.

Low-cost health policies stressed

A visiting American professor has stressed low-profile and less expensive intervention strategies instead of high-profile expensive modern facilities for cost effective health care in developing countries including Bangladesh, reports UNB.

Dr Jonathan Morduch, a professor of Economics at Harvard University, told a seminar here yesterday that both donors and the governments of developing countries currently emphasise high cost hospitals, medical instruments and other services.

The seminar on "Health Care Policies in Developing Countries" was organised by the Independent University of Bangladesh (IUB).

Sound health care policies in developing countries, he said, should rather emphasise improved environmental conditions, such as sanitation, nutritious food, inoculation from measles, expansion of education, alleviation of poverty and safe drinking water and clean air.

Dr Morduch said that both the government's of developing countries and the donor agencies should shun their traditional attitude and shift focus on preventive and cost-effective measures for ensuring health care for all.

Referring to United Nations annual development report's current year's focus on health policy, he hoped that this would help immensely in bringing about such attitudinal changes.

Senegalese envoy presents credentials

The ambassador-designate of Senegal to Bangladesh, Papa Abdou Cisse, yesterday presented his credentials to President Abdur Rahman Biswas at Bangabhaban, reports BSS.

Accepting the credentials, the President said that there existed enormous scope for expanding mutually beneficial relations between Bangladesh and Senegal as they have a common religion, Islamic heritage and culture which contribute immensely in sharing the perceptions and close similarity of views of the two countries on many important international issues.

"Our two countries have also stood by the side of the Bosnian brothers in their struggle to maintain freedom, independence and territorial integrity of their country," President Biswas said.

The President said that the two countries were making sincere efforts to further consolidate and diversify bilateral relations through signing a number of agreements on cooperation in the fields of trade, commerce and culture.
