Out of Old Enemies, Turkey Makes New Allies

by Nancy Wong

In this fast changing world, where many nations break into pieces, some former enemies turn allies extending a helping hand with distant neighbours bridging the gaps to become close friends. The latter happened when the Central Asian republics left the Soviet Union to form the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). Although they were practically next door neighbours with Turkey, politics during the Soviet Union days dictated a distant relationship. When things fell apart and the centre could not hold anymore, Turkey was among the first countries to come forward with concrete proposals of assistance to these largely Muslim states.

dried fruit to industrial ware like iron and steel, metals, chemicals and fertilisers. Although the CIS lacks foreign exchange for the time being, credit facilities have been worked out with the various governments, as "Turkey is not interested in barter trade anymore," explained Guldere. "Our relations with the CIS are growing by the day. There was a time when a dozen agreements were signed, one after another since we had immediately following their independence set the necessary framework for bilateral agreements," he elaborated.

After a two-year stay in Bangladesh, Guldere has been assigned to Turkey's Permanent Delegation to the United Nations in Geneva.

Speaking of this new found partnership, the Head of Chancery in the Turkish Embassy here, Salih Bogac Guldere, in a farewell interview, told The Daily Star: "Turkey opened embassies in these states soon after their independence as our aim is to help them establish pluralistic democracies based on the market economy so that in time they can join the outside world. We have established banks giving extensive credit facilities, initiated joint ventures as well as gone into direct investments in some areas — particularly in Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan — where oil exploration is a real possibility."

"While Turkey may not have oil, we do have the technology for its exploration" — he added with a smile. Of the many countries which are keen to help the Central Asian bloc Turkey probably has an edge over them. For starters, both share the same ancestry for their people trace their origins way back to the legendary conqueror, Genghis Khan. Unsurprisingly, their language comes from the same root and although pure Turkic as such may not be spoken in the CIS because of their Soviet past and dilution throughout the centuries, Guldere affirmed. "We have no difficulty understanding each other. Although language is a dynamic process and is evolving endlessly, the root remains the same."

In fact, Turkey is providing thousands of scholarships for study in her various universities and is building, equipping and staffing numerous schools throughout the CIS. It is also training civil servants to operate in an open economy — all "in the main endeavour to integrate them into the new world they have emerged so that they may reap the rewards of a market economy as rapidly as possible," continued Guldere.

In addition to the participation in joint ventures and "invisible exports" such as technology in manufacturing and exploitation of natural resources, Turkey has a vast array of manufactured goods and agricultural products to sell to the CIS. They range from wheat, pulses, lentils, important road has been named after the father of modern Turkey, Kemal Ataturk. He recalled that "this happened in 1982 when Metin Sirman was the ambassador and Ziaur Rahman the President of Bangladesh." He further noted: "Turkey provides university scholarships to many countries and Dhaka is one of the few centres in the world where the Turkish university entrance exams are held. It is conducted in English, though there is an optional Turkish knowledge paper which can be taken in Turkic. We offer 20 such scholarships annually. The rate of success by the candidates here is very high — close to 90 per cent." The beauty of this offer is that students can choose whatever subjects they wish to pursue in any of the Turkish universities.

Trade relations is normally an important aspect of diplomacy and it is no different in this case. According to Guldere, the total value of trade between the two countries is US$20 million per annum — mostly in Bangladesh's favour. He feels that "this certainly does not reflect the full potential" and suggests that "if joint chambers of commerce could be established in Dhaka, even a modest secretariat would be able to disseminate more information and make appointments for bilateral visits for businessmen from both countries to explore further possibilities for trade to flourish."
