New York Times reports

'Khaleda aggressively promoting education'

Prime Minister Begum Khaleda Zia is aggressively promoting education and vocational training, especially of girls, and expanding small-scale, no collateral lending to increase the self-sufficiency of women, the New York Times (NYT) has reported, says BSS.

"The task is enormous when she took office." The US daily said quoting the UNDP and added, the average Bangladeshi was getting about two years of formal schooling while only a third of school-children were Barbara Crossette, the NYT reporter, wrote the article recently based on her conversations with Begum Khaleda Zia when she was in New York to deliver her speech in the UN General Assembly session. Barbara in her report said the widow of President Ziaur Rahman, who was assassinated 1981, surprised

Bangladeshis first by casting aside a demure first-lady image to join civilian politics in a tough nine-year street campaign for democracy. The movement finally toppled Lt Gen H M Ershad, New York Times said in report and added that she had demonstrated unexpected political strength by leading her husband's Bangladesh Nationalist Party to a decisive victory in the election that followed in early Begum Zia said that women in villages work in the fields and in towns. They also work outside homes. "Women are taking part on cultural activities and in politics as well as working on the offices and in government departments as officers and teachers," she said.

"We allow and encourage women to participate in all fields of national life."

The New York Times report touched upon Begum Zia government's education policy and quoted the Prime Minister as having stated that primary education in Bangladesh was now free and compulsory up to grade five and for girls free up to grade eight.

The Prime Minister said that her government was experimenting in some areas with a scheme that was giving foodgrains to families who were sending their children to schools.

She also said that she had a discretionary fund for girls who were bright but too poor to continue their studies.
