WFP UN Day 1993

Former minister and Editor and publisher of The Weekly Friday Shawfikul Ghaani

When a woman can earn money and control it, it is a big step forward; she is on her way to self-reliance. With her own income she can make decisions on how the money is to be spent.

WFP food aid also supports a savings scheme. While receiving the wheat, each woman deposits in the bank Tk 25/- every month for two years-money she could not save otherwise.

After two years, each woman has a small pool of capital-but it is not enough to go into business. A credit scheme was set up by selling wheat donated by WFP, Australia and the European Community and the revenue is put into a revolving credit fund of Tk. 9.27 crore, managed by BRAC.

In the first 4 years, almost 53,000 women received loans, mainly to help them start rearing poultry. These women are skilled at diversifying their sources of income and many ask for a second loan to buy rice, which they husk and sell; to buy cows and goats; or to start other businesses. In spite of their poverty, the repayment rate stands at more than 99 per cent.

With her earnings, Banesa has been able to buy more and better food for the family, a few aluminium pots and pans, a second sari for herself, and clothes and school supplies for the children-not only for her son but also for her two daughters.

Banesa has transformed her role and status in the family and community. Now, village men ask her advice about poultry. This is a profound change whose effects will be passed on to the next generation.

One basic idea fuels this project: give a woman a chance to break the cycle of poverty and the ties of dependence and she will take it. Banesa tried and succeeded. There are millions of other women who deserve the same opportunity.
