

Dhaka Day by Day

The Three-Wheeled Menace

by Parveen Anam

Life in Dhaka is a mess. And please let us for once, not argue about it. Not that we can argue on anything so blatantly honest and frank. Even the Dhakaites, the most beloved and yet the most harassed of species to wander the streets of the city at this point of time, agrees on this one readily. Perhaps because he is on the receiving end. The battering he takes every day from life in general, as he meekly tries to go about his way, is something else again.

The rickshaw we all agree, manage to make life almost intolerable: it also gives the Dhakaites an invaluable opportunity, to practice his adjectives. The choice words so often heard as he rolls down the window of his car, to holler at the rickshaw puller, would be a delight to Prof. Higgin's ears. Give him something to work on.

However, what we would like to see being taken to task or at least taken in by the police, is the inevitable 'baby taxi' as we so lovingly like to call them, when we are not calling them something else. The rickshaw at least moves at a speed which is not disastrous. In fact, some would swear they move far too slowly. The 'baby taxis' on the other hand are of course just the opposite. The driver of that vehicle, is of the very distinct impression, that he is in keen competition with the speed of time. He whizzes in and out of traffic with nary a thought about the safety of either his passenger or the pedestrian. His own existence he has put into the hands of the devil, so that does not matter. The fact that the passenger might think otherwise is apparently of no consequence to him.

It is interesting to see the driver of these three-wheeled threat to humanity, line up in a straight line at the traffic signal, completely blocking the path of every other form of transport. Then they start to compete with each other in the magic of beating the rest of the traffic, in either trying to reach the next intersection or any destination.

The most favoured role in all this circus antics is of course that of the police man, who stands there with a most nonchalant expression. Those 'baby scooters' should either be made to obey the traffic laws, to some extent at least, or banned from most city roads. They pose a threat not only to their passengers who are to tally by the mercy of that half-drunk driver, they are also a positive menace to the other saner forms of traffic. At times, the driver even manages to snatch the proverbial 'forty winks' as he weaves in and out of traffic. It is certainly not a particularly pleasant experience to see the driver of the 'baby taxi' dozing fitfully behind the wheel, as a truck tears down at about sixty miles straight at the 'taxi'. He manages to wake up just in time to waver out of the truck's path. If he is lucky.

The Dhakaites seem quite placid about the entire situation, of course. Although one does get the sneaky feeling at times that he is just about fed up with everything. The Dhakaites can shout himself hoarse: the authorities never even have time to read the daily newspapers which at times can be pretty caustic about the antics of the 'powers that be'. It must be rather nice to have skin which is so thick.

Enhancement of water tariff criticised

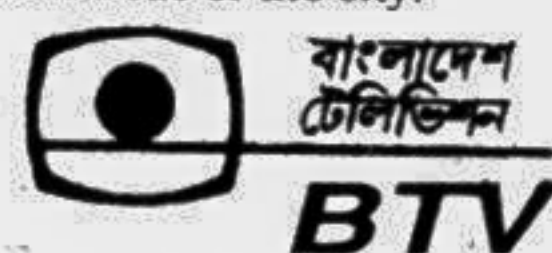

By Staff Correspondent

The Citizen's Vigilance Council (CIVIC) yesterday criticised the government for raising water charge by ten per cent saying, Dhaka WASA had done nothing significant in the recent past to justify the rate-hike.

In a joint statement president of CIVIC A K Faezul Huq and general secretary Mesabuddin Sabu said, the rate-hike was most untimely and without any justification.

It said, the middle-class, the lower middle-class and the fixed income group would be the worst victims of the WASA rate-hike.

In contrast with the rate-hike, it said, the WASA was responsible for double-billing and irregular supplies of water in most areas of the city.
