Zia even took the matter to

Founder-Editor: Late S. M. Ali

Dhaka, Friday, December 24, 1993

Straight Talk at the DCs' Conference

The Deputy Commissioners' conference which ended in the city yesterday was featured by some straight talk. The briefing session chaired by the Cabinet Secretary just prior to the inauguration of the conference by the Prime Minister was marked by a recital of some functional difficulties by a few DCs. This was reportedly in reaction to a reminder that various ministerial targets have remained unfulfilled.

The Prime Minister herself was strikingly straightforward in her inaugural address to the conference. She was even circumspect and self-effacing. She said to the effect that the entire administration would have to answer for any negligence of duties if it were to push the nation backwards. The other point she emphasised related to the enforcement of the anti-terrorism law. She urged the officials to ensure strict and impartial application of the law that gave sweeping powers to the police rendering it harsh, as it is. She called for such a qualified enforcement of the law for the purpose of creating a climate conducive to economic investments.

While welcoming her concern for the judicious application of the law we believe the responsibility of her government does not end by making a call for it. She has to ensure through her own mechanism — and she can rely on a number of agencies— that her directive for an impartial enforcement of the anti-terrorism law is implemented. And if the opposition can cite specific instances of the abuse of the law these must be gone into.

On an overall basis, the allegations being heard from time to time against excessive use of the law make it a fit subject for unrelenting monitoring and periodic reviews. After all the onus lies with the government to prove that the extraordinary law was necessary.

On a functional plane, the DCs pointed out they remained busy with political programmes at the expense of development functioning. They blamed the slow-down of work on political 'hassles' and the paralytic effect of the Prokrichi's conflict with them.

As a sign of political interference, they alleged transfers on incurring displeasure of MPs. Two ministers hailing from the same district could give differing advice in a single matter, some of them complained, with candour.

There is no denying the administrative paralysis caused by the Prokrichi — BCS (Admn) cadre warfare. The issue obviously has some time-consuming aspects to its resolution. Does it mean that it will serve as an expedient excuse ad infinitum for any administrative malfunctioning? So, the rationale is compelling to bring the crisis to a speedy end with political intervention at the highest level.

So far as the complaints of any undue political interference in administration goes, one can only seek relief in the Prime Minister's repeated assurances to the officials that they need not fear any retribution if they act neutrally. Obviously she has to find out now whether her verbal encouragement to the officials to function freely and fairly is being actually acted upon lower down the hierarchy.

S. Africa's Choice

South Africa is on its way to making history. With the endorsement of a new constitution in the white-dominated parliament on Wednesday — giving blacks and whites equal rights for the first time in history — the country has advanced a step closer to the goal of transition from apartheid to democracy. Earlier, the other notable agreement reached between the government of President F W de Klerk and the African National Congress (ANC) was on the constitution of a committee empowering it to supersede the government on disputed matters relating to election during the transition period. All this augurs well.

However, the key question concerns the holding of the April 27 election peacefully and to that end all these exercises will be of immense help but, unfortunately, not enough. The reason is clearly the failure of the country's contending parties to sink their differences across the table. Apart from the ruling National Party and the ANC, Inkatha Freedom Party and the pro-apartheid Conservative Party are the forces to reckon with and the opposition of the last two parties to the constitution carries in itself a threat of widespread violence. South Africa's record on political murder is hardly rivalled anywhere: no less than 13,000 such murders have taken place since Mandela's release from prison in 1990.

election is fraught with danger. The opponents of the deal between the ANC and the government may not reverse the course of history, now in the making, but at least they have, admittedly, enough power to make the process more painful than seems necessary. Had they seen reason, the historic moments for the country could be fittingly redeemed. But the uncompromising attitudes of the white right-wing groups have even led to their preparation for a possible war. The discovery of a huge catche of arms, including mortars and rocket launchers, recently pointed to a chilling prospect.

There is little indication that the Klerk government or the international community has taken the threat seriously and is bracing up to the task. For a country having little experience with election; ground preparation for the occasion is as important as the actual holding of the election. Almost half of the country's workforce cannot read. The campaign, let alone the exercise of franchise, is not expected to be orderly and peaceful if the fear of the backlash from the opponents has not been removed. The UN peace-keepers did the job marvellously well in Cambodia. The challenges of holding a free and fair election in S. Africa is no less - if not more — daunting. Involvement of international monitoring and peace-keeping organisations should be ensured much ahead of the polls.

After all this has been ensured, the elected government, almost sure to be headed by ANC President Nelson Maridela, will be in a position to set about the task of minding the business of governance with confidence. Hopes of the black South Africans have been raised to a dizzying height but the difference between them and their White counterparts is huge in terms of living standard. Economic equality will not be achieved soon, yet the new government must start the process of bridging the yawning gaps."

THILE their governments are mired in Waiting for the Next Great Flood getting together on their own to study potential areas of cooperation.

In a unique experiment called The Patna Initiative, named after the capital of the near future.

past three decades, but experts say siltation has raised the Kosi's river-bed higher than the surrounding land — making a catastrophe inevitable in the near future.

"Ours is a confidence-building process to start working with people who are directly affected by floods. The real downstream beneficiaries or sufferers are not the people living in national capitals," says Nepali water expert Ajay Dixit.

Nepali and Indian experts

Nepali and Indian experts say region-wide studies incorporating Bangladesh would be the next step.

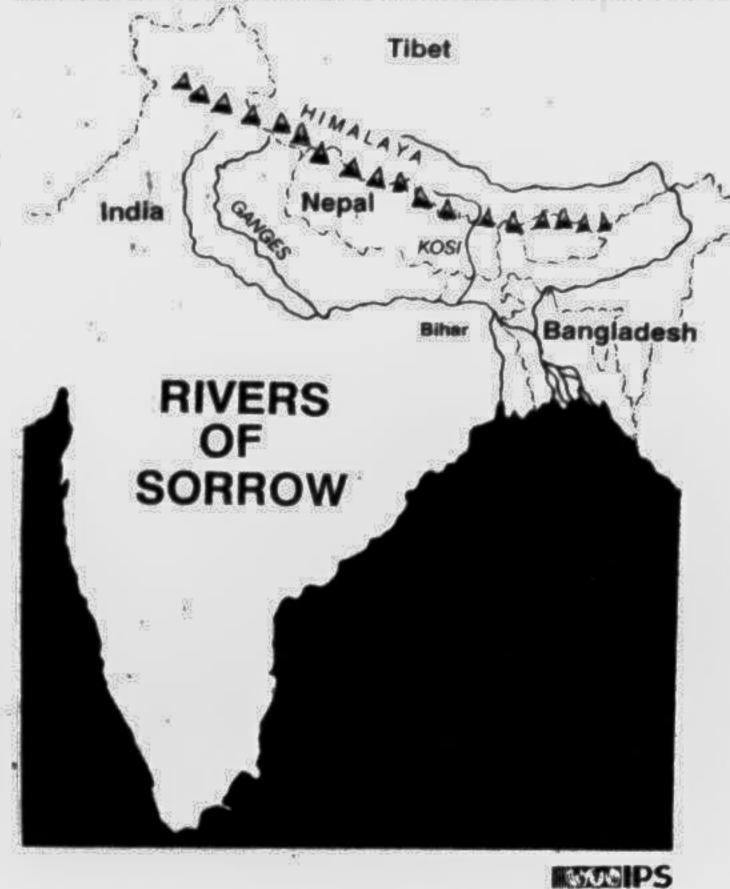

If the Ganges River basin encompassing Nepal, eastern India and Bangladesh was a separate country, it would have about 400 million people. It would also be the poorest on earth.

The three countries share literacy levels, infant mortality rates and life expectancies that are inferior even by South Asian standards. But ironically, this is also the richest area of the world in potential hydro-power.

The fast-flowing rivers that drain the Himalaya in Nepal contribute 71 per cent of the dry season flow of the Ganges as it meanders across the Indian states of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar and into Bangladesh.

But the three countries have not even started talking about sharing the region's water wealth, and existing bilateral projects are bogged down in controversy.

Nepal's problem is that is has too much hydro-power, but cannot afford to build dams on its own. The landlocked country Impatient with gridlocked governments, South Asian water experts are getting together to plan joint projects. Binod Bhattarai of Inter Press Service reports from Kathmandu

Short News, Long Views

by Abdul Bayes

MSIDIP:

Every monsoon, Nepal's rivers burst out of the mountains and submerge huge tracts of the north Indian plains and flow into the swollen Ganges to inundate Bangladesh, before emptying into the Bay of Ben-

India and Bangladesh suffer the same curse: too much water during the monsoon and too little in the dry season.

The ideal solution would be to build storage reservoirs in the mountains that could generate power and regulate flood waters. But lack of regional cooperation, unanswered questions about dams in a seismically active zone and the exorbitant price tag of such projects have blocked progress.

India and Bangladesh have not even been able to agree on how to share the waters of the Ganges at a border barrage at Farakka during the dry scason. Its last agreement expired in 1988.

Bangladesh, which suffers the most from annual floods, has called for a regional dialogue ever since the great deluge of 1988 in which three-fourths of the country was submerged and a staggering 33 million people were made temporarily homeless.

"The rivers flow through Nepal and India and reach Bangladesh. We have always wanted that development of water resources should be done through discussions, negotiations and dialogue," Bangladesh premier prime minister Khaleda Zia said during a recent visit here.

But India has opposed regional talks, preferring to deal with Nepal and Bangladesh separately.

the United Nations in October when she indirectly accused India of blocking water at the Farakka barrage during the dry season and flooding Bangladesh in the rainy season by releasing excess water. She told the assembly: 'They Farakka Barrage has become an issue of life and india's efforts to convince Nepal to jointly harness flimalayan rivers have also been hampered by mutual mistrust. The two countries have not had a major river project since the While governments dither, water experts in Kathmandu, Patna and Dhaka are increasingly worried about how the Kosi will behave during the next rainy season. A barrage built on the Nepal border in 1959 is silted up and has no flood control capability left.

The Kosi has been shifting westwards across the Bihar plains at the rate of one kilometer per year for the past 120 years, and a breach on its embankments could wipe out entire cities that have sprung up along old river beds, scientists

When the Kosi last overflowed its levees six years ago, 33 of Bihar's 39 districts were engulfed.

Non-governmental experts from Nepal and India say unless politicians stop playing games and look for feasible solutions, the next Bihar flood could be even more devastating.

Says Prasad: "Despite the mutuality of interest to harness water, optimal development has not taken place because of political and other priorities."

GATT Set Go

Indian state of Bihar, non-government water experts from

Nepal's Royal Nepal Academy of Science and Technology

(RONAST) and Patna University's Centre for Water Resources Study (CWRS) will investigate joint projects, taking eastern Nepal's Kost River as a which can bring development to Bihar which is one of India's poorest states," says T Prasad of CWRS. "Proper use of water for irrigation alone promises a ten per cent increase in the state's to take up studies on the different river systems of the Himalaya-Ganges basin to draw up development guidelines

"We will work on publicly based on scientific and eco-available documents based on pure science and with open

RONAST. "There should be more respect for scientific truth

The Kosi originates in Tibet and cuts through the Himalaya near Mt Everest in a series of stupendous gorges and fans out into the Bihar plains. Because of its furious floods the Kosi has long been known as The Sorrow built over 3,400 km of embankments in Bihar over the

The Indian government has is all we are trying to say."

minds," says Dipak Gyawali of

The Bihar-Nepal group plans

"Water is a critical resource test case.

agricultural yield."

nomic criteria.

of Bihar'.

All the daily newspapers of the world headlined GATT's last-minute deliverance from an impasse created by the US and the EC. Readers are aware that the baby so reborn was an endproduct of some unanticipated and unresolved haggling at the fag end of 116 nations' participation in 7-year-long parleys This 8th round of GATT ended breeding more hopes than despair all over the world because, unlike other rounds of talks. the Uruguay Round had in its orbit the most vital sector for many developing countries agriculture. As is well known the potential supremacy of agricultural products and merchandise of the developing countries has remained unrealized unfortunately due to heavy subsidisation by the developed and their protectionist measures. After the Geneva trade accord it is expected that agricultural production and trade would take place through relocation of resources as per the theory of comparative costs and not by any artificially created self-stimulus. The manufacturing exports and imports are likely to face further tariff cuts.

The GATT secretariat assumes that the deal would add about US$750 billion a year to world merchandise trade by the year 2005. If services trade are included, the gain might be even higher than being speculated. The most remarkable achievement appears to be a 'no' to growing protectionism that tended to squeeze the volume of world trade, distort allocation of resources and hinder economic growth.

However, all that glitters may not be gold. The GATT talks mainly focused on quantitative restrictions and far less on non-tariff barriers. Even if duties are reduced by, say, 10%, non-tariff excuses could deter the flow of trade many times more. Again, there looms large the apprehension that the success so achieved would mainly benefit the 'bigs' but the 'smalls' have to wait in the side lines as before. This frustrating note has already been expressed by many LDCs as well as by LLDCs. Is the bright hope to glimmer? Only coming days

Pak GDP Nosedives to

can answer.

The Daily Star of 13 December 1993 reported that Pakistan's GDP nosedived to 3% as compared to the target of a little over 6%. The realized growth rate appeared to match the population growth rate with no change in the per capita index The growth rate is assumed to be threshed, according to the Central Bank Report, by the poor performance of the agricultural sector that posited a negative growth of 4% induced by a 12% fall in the production of major crops e.g. cotton, rice and sugarcane.

Pakistan is one of the SAARC countries that has been experiencing a higher growth rate than other partners of SAARC and it is thought to have developed a strong industrial base.

The frustrating news seems only to lend the lesson that any move to induce a higher growth rate without a proper treatment to agricultural sector, either from the standpoint of technology or that of nature, might recoil. Agriculture still is the linchpin of sustainable growth and development in this part of

has a feasible potential to generate some 45,000 megawatts of electricity. It has tapped only 250 megawatts.

Reduction in the Use of Fertilizer in Dinajpur

The Sangbad on 16 December 1993 reported a decline in the per acre yield of the major paddy crop, Aman, in greater Dinajpur district which is famous for rice production in Bangladesh. Why? The report suspects that a fall in the use of chemical fertilizer by 30-40% might have caused the debacle. And the decline in the use of fertilizer is reported to have em anated from an unfavourable price ratio between paddy and fertilizer, experienced by farmers over the last season or so. What happened to Aman production might also stalk the ensuing boro season with boro and wheat to come, the same report apprehends. The report carries weight for the fact that the revelation is the result of a survey on as many as 5000 farmers by the Agricultural Directorate of Dinajpur.

Policy-makers in our country tend to argue that gross sales of fertilizer has been on an increase over the years and that probably belies the higher pricelower demand theory of economics. However, the observed phenomenon does appear to be in consort with the principles of micro economics. Total demand for fertilizer might have gone up due to a greater horizontal expansion of the fertilizer-using crops over the years. But the price effect has been correspondingly pronounced with the intensity of fertilizer use which is one of the major determinants of the per acre yield. In a land-scarce country like.ours, a decline in the per acre yield is anything but soothing news especially in the face of a falling paddy price. The apparent autarky in food production is more of a nature's gift than the fruit of technological progress in farming. To ensure sustainable growth in agriculture, more care needs to be taken for the proper use of modern inputs like fertilizer. Otherwise, as it happened in Pakistan, the growth rate here could also nosedive, today or to-morrow.

Senior Officials Lose Jobs

The Sangbad on 11 December reported that a total of 94 senior officials had been asked to quit their jobs in South Korea and 140 more warned to mend their ways. The crusade against the public servants as also against the bureaucratic manocuvres to wriggle out of it seemed to have made for the resignations, as could be guessed from the report. It may be mentioned here that three ministers along with a batch of senior civil, military and judicial officers were earlier forced out of office following different charges brought against them by the government.

Our own chronicle of crusades against corruption tended to show that vows were taken by successive governments to weed out corruption closely on the heels of their assuming power. And some scratches were made on the hot iron but with the passage of time the iron cooled down - making it harder for any strike really. A further disconcerting thing is that excepting a very few, most of those charged, appeared to be political personalities. But later, the turn-around of politics seemed to acquit them of the charges and sometimes be even rewarded. What more, constant factor in the domain of government has been that highly placed public servants remained untouched despite the fact that charges of rampant corruption against some of them had been aired from time to time. Thus government comes and government goes, but corruption remains. Hats off to the S Korean government which has shown that in the eye of law, ministers, high or low officials are equal and further that such a corrective action elevates government's image rather than meting it. We have been taught a lesson by South Korea. Why not take the cue?

Private Housing Bank The Financial Express on 19,

1993 stated that a private housing bank was likely to be set up soon with active support from the government. The proposed housing bank is expected to be an answer to the acute housing problem in the metropolitan and other cities. According to the report, government would have a share of 70% of the proposed paid-up capital while the rest will be subscribed in the private sector. To be run on a commercial basis, the proposed bank is likely to charge an interest rate of

The disarray in which the House Building Finance Corporation finds itself is as well known as the distress of those seeking housing facilities in the city. In the past, the problems of finance, be it in agriculture, industry or house building. were sought to be faced more by reducing the price of capital whereas supply or availability of credit in time and at lower transaction costs never seemed to occupy the agenda of policymakers. As a result, credit facilities were mostly reaped by those who were adept in the art of manipulation required to avail themselves of such credit. It is hoped that the current idea of a private housing bank, if materialised with appropriate supporting devices, might lessen the burden to a larger

Letters for publication in these columns should be addressed to the Editor and legibly written or typed with double space. For reasons of space, short letters are preferred, and all are subject to editing and cuts. Pseudonyms are accepted. However, all communications must bear the writer's real name, signature and address:

Do or die?

Sir, It was not the end of the universe, nor was it the death of cricket in Bangladesh, because it was only a test — of prowess at the rockbottom — and a just beginning for the Bangladeshi learners who have to bank on what they mastered from the recent study tours nextdoors and special interactions at home with the perfect strangers in the Test community.

Never mind the defeats in India and Shri Lanka that Bangladeshi smarties brought back home from their expedition, for everything happened out in their neighbours grounds was meant to be of educational sessions for the pundit's pupils on the road to the close encounter of the first kind.

Back on home soil, Test infants Zimbabwe proved to be mature enough for the Test-expectant hosts, no matter what the odds were.

In order for the Bangladeshi

In order for the Bangladeshi Gullivers (back in the Asian Brobdingnags' territory once more) to have what will be needed to get the asking rate ever with to pass out of the upcoming qualifier, more trials at the first class matches will be helping develop aptitude of the do-or-diers eyeing the next World Cup.

Although nobody can tell for sure when and how the Bangladeshi cricket maniacs will make it to the Test wicket, the domestic cricket watchers will keep their fingers crossed (to witness them in action among the World Cuppers).

M Rahman
 Zila School Road, Mymensingh

".... Confused Deshi"

Sir, It has been quite interesting, though at times quite disturbingly so, to "listen" to the confessions of a self-declared Bangladeshi Born Confused Deshi in The Daily Star Weekend Magazine. One can hardly be blamed for not knowing that such a 'species' can exist (no offense intended!) let alone their predicaments.

Madame, your name itself can be quite a considerable source of confusion, though I am sure you were not properly consulted, when the decision to that effect was taken. None of us were, for that matter. One, however, wonders whether such a practice could have compounded or resolved confusions relating to appellations. In fact it so happened (to be quite honest), that as I was glancing the paper casually, I first thought the piece have been composed by two persons. take the entire blame, if there is any, but come to think of it, my good lady, you have at least been able to confuse someone, without taking any responsibil-

If one simply chooses to juxtapose your oriental back ground against your occidental exposure, one cannot, I am afraid, fully comprehend the intricacies of your confusions. After all there have been many, even among the average enlightened selbalteins, not to speak of sublime personalities," of recent and immediate past, for whom the western enlightenment did not come as a source of confusion. What happened presumably in your case, madame, is that you perhaps had a sort of premature exposure - it had happened at a time when what you term as your roots were not defined. Note that in many cases the sequence really does not or rather did not matter - the most notable of them are perhaps today's Indian English writers. But most of them, again, are writing about India. I suppose you are right, madame, one cannot at the end of the day deny one's roots.

Seeing from this perspective, madame, you certainly show considerable promises. After all, identifying the sources of confusion is the first — and some say foremost - step to remove it. And one must admit that you have done a pretty good job at that. Even I would go to the extent of saying that your confessions really did not sound like those of a confused person (though I must point out I am not a professional confessional listener - there are people with adequate and often intimidating expertise for that job).

When one listens to the duet of Ravi Shankar and Yehudi Menuhin, one cannot simply consider oneself to be a believer of the old precept 'East is east and west is west, the twins will never meet'. You people with your challenging and chequered background can show it is indeed not the case — they can

You suggested an organisation of some sort involving BBCDS. What about a broad based body of those of us who believe in the union of east and west?

Q M Munzur-t-Murshed

meet and they do meet.

117 Azimpur Road, Dhaka

Baridhara 'J' Block
Sir, While appreciating and congratulating Mr Asiuzzaman on his report on Baridhara 'J' Block in your esteemed daily on October 23, 1993, I wish to add further information in this re-

Eight years after allotment, the allottees still remain deprived of the plots. Without knowing the actual position of the land (which was allotted to others much earlier) how could a ruling MP, or RAJUK or the government can pledge to the original people for derequisition depriving the genuine allottees?

The mischief created by RAJUK during Ershad regime should not be repeated now, maybe to satisfy a single local MP, depriving 360 allottees.

Without taking possession of the land in 'J' Block, how could RAJUK invite applications for the plots of lands, and enter in so many formalities with the allottees, and allot the so called plots and take all the price of plots in a single instalment (in case of four instalments with added interests)? In other areas of the city, RAJUK handed over plots after receiving the first instalment. Now they say they have no land in Baridhara 'J' Block. RAJUK supplied maps with names and numbers of roads and plots. For the mischief or mistake done by RAJUK, only RAJUK should be penalised, not the allottees.

The original owners (peasants) sold their lands long ago. These were virtually sold and resold a few times. Therefore the original owners would not be available.

Some lands in that area, it is hard, were bought by RAJUK people under assumed names. May be anticipating dirty play by RAJUK, some allottees sold their papers of plots at 15 lac Taka for 5-katha plots.

Now it is assumed that the two groups (RAJUK people and who purchased the allotment papers) along with the local MP are trying to grab 'J' Block to-

Was it an election pledge? Even if so, should the government move according to an election pledge given to people by an MP depriving 359 allottees, it would not be an act of a good governance.

To solve this problem is not so hard. There are 50 acres of land besides 32 acres intended to be derequisitioned by the local MP. There are 359 allottees needing 2961.75 decimals out of 4941.75 decimals (less than 50 acres) at an average of 5 kathas or 8.25 decimals per allottee. The excess 1980 decimals may be utilised for roads, supermarkets and public utility works. If 1980 decimals of land is not sufficient for these purposes, then necessary land should be released from that 32 acres intended to be derequisitioned. A 'give and take' formula can easily bring good results.

The Hon'ble Minister for Works reportedly has given assurance to solve the problem and to do it within the shortest possible time. The allottees will remain thankful to the Hon'ble Minister for his good gesture, and grateful for a just and earliest solution.

Vox populi BTV second channel

Sir, With the development of technology, it is now easy to see different TV programmes of other countries. Dish antenna facility is now available in every locality. Our people are enjoying ZeeTV, Star TV programmes all day long. Star TV is also producing a separate TV programme channel in the name of Music Television. The music programme may erode the moralities of our youngsters. Some of the programmes are not suitable for our taste. We have got a cultural heritage of our own. If our boys and girls switch over to foreign TV programmes, then they may forget

I know there are many things which we can learn from the transmission of foreign TVs. But these TVs have also got many negative sides that may spoil our youngsters.

If we can introduce a second channel on BTV and can offer good entertainment then our boys and girls may fruitfully spend some time there. We would request the Ministry of Information to ponder over the matter seriously and go for introducing of a second channel immediately for diverting our younger generations from the frenzy of Music TV.

Mahbubul Haque Chowdhury Kalabagan, Dhaka