Bangladesh's Place in a New World Vision

by Naila Sattar

Dr Gerald O Barney, the Founder-Director of the Millennium Institute, was on his first visit to Bangladesh last week. Dr. Barney, who lives in Arlington, Virginia, prepared the US government's "Global 2000 Report" at the initiative of former US President Jimmy Carter. It was published in 1980.

This report, the first of its kind by a national government, outlines "the economic, demographic, resource, and environmental future of all countries of the world." An updated edition of this report entitled "Global 2000 Revisited: What shall we do?" was prepared for the 1993 Parliament of World Religions in Chicago and addresses some critical questions of the 21st century. Dr Katherine Esty, Vice-Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Millennium Institute, and Dr Barney together have travelled to about forty countries and worked towards "promoting long-term integrated global thinking." They have assisted research teams in a fifth of the world's countries, in preparing "21st century studies" — long-term strategic studies of their option for sustainable development and security. They feel that it is important to include spiritual leaders in the process of preparing such studies because these leaders have "vital contribution to make to a country's reflections on sustainable possibilities for the future."

Dr. Barney and Dr Esty believe that "the entry into the 21st century and the new millennium needs to be understood as an anniversary of the earth 'in which all people participate. The year 2000 should be a time for humans to 'pause and reflect about where we have come and where we are going. It should be a time for us to build identity with the earth and with other nations and to create a catalogue of things needed on earth," says Dr Esty. Dr Barney asks for a fast shift towards interdependence and the creation of a global network of people to create an awareness of the impending challenges. Both would like to see each nation send representatives to a selected meeting place, as we enter the 21st century, to discuss the future and to give the earth something from their country or from their own faith, tradition, that will help "change the course of the earth."

This visit from Dr Barney and Dr Esty was sponsored by UNICEF. Dr Rolf Carriere, the country representative of UNICEF in Bangladesh heard the speech that Dr Barney gave at the Parliament of World Religions in Chicago last year, and felt that Bangladesh would benefit from his and Dr Esty's insight and assistance. Dr Carriere arranged for the visitors to meet with several people involved in development work in Bangladesh. Dr

Barney and Dr Esty talked with several people about doing a study on where Bangladesh will be about 30 or 40 years from now and about creating a global awareness of the absolute necessity of handing the earth and her resources with the utmost care. They talked about sustainable development and the earth's capacity to support a human population of approximately 12 billion by the year 2150. Dr Barney also delivered a lecture at the ICDDRDB on Tuesday, the 18 January.

The critical issues that require examination include population growth and its related problems such as hunger, poverty and strife, the availability of arable land and increasing agricultural output, the environment, and the exhaustion of the world's oil resources. Dr Barney is trying to get spiritual leaders from different faiths and traditions to examine all these issues also and to talk about what their religions say in favour of conservation, tolerance, family planning, and so on.

Coming to Bangladesh was a positive experience for both visitors. They spoke of the resilience of the Bangladesh spirit and the strength of Bangladeshis in overcoming hardship. They hope that they will be as successful here as they were in China. There, ministries and persons in position of authority have, with assistance from Dr. Barney and Dr Esty, done studies on the future, and are now planning for a development process which is sustainable but less taxing. They would like to bring together a "broad spectrum of interests and to get a more holistic multi-dimensional picture of the Bangladesh." Dr. Esty feels that there are too many divisions in governments — too many people with too many different functions, who do not interact with one another frequently enough. Common goals must be identified and ministries, NGOs, banks, educationists, must all work together to achieve them. Dr Barney feels that a critical problem that Bangladesh may face in the next few decades is the shift in the rural-urban balance, that is, migration of people from rural areas to urban areas in search of employment. A point in favour of Bangladesh is that the country is not heavily dependent upon fossil fuel subsidy.

Dr Barney and Dr Esty are both committed individuals who believe that things will improve for Bangladesh if a national consciousness is aroused and the correct choices are made at the correct time. They stressed that they visited Bangladesh because they care about what happens to this country as well as to others, because, ultimately, all countries are connected and therefore interdependent. They look forward to returning soon and hope that they can assist in doing a study on Bangladesh as it enters the 21st century.
