

Dhaka Day by Day

East or West, Home is Best?

by Rashida Ahmad

Incurable pessimism appears to be a national characteristic in Bangladesh. People complain almost about everything — from the road traffic to the insolence of servants. Almost every conversation contains some disparaging remarks about the state of the country or its people. Criticism of the status quo has always played an important role in most societies, but the grievances aired in everyday social intercourse are not positive criticisms. It is bitter cynicism mixed with disillusionment. The notion that the West is best seems to underlie this deep dissatisfaction that people feel. But is this belief justified?

People in Dhaka speak of buildings that have tilted to dangerous degrees, because they were built without the proper foundations, with despair in their voices as if substandard building work were unique to Bangladesh. But those who know will confirm that London has witnessed the dereliction of whole towerblocks in the inner cities, built in the sixties with structural faults and cheap materials. Some of these buildings are known to have collapsed altogether. In some cases only one or two flats out of a whole block have been occupied usually by the poor.

Complaints about the service sector abound. For example, car mechanics here are looking for a chance to cheat the customer by replacing a whole headlight when all that was required was a new cover. But mechanics are the same the world over. In England if a clutch needs adjusting they will put in a whole new gearbox and change all the tyres if you're not careful, assuring you that it was absolutely necessary.

As for the complaint against corruption, it is not unheard of even in the capitals of the cradles of democracy. Some in the states complain there is not much to choose between the CIA and the Mafia. Remember Watergate and Irangate, maybe, Iraqgate is shortly to follow, or perhaps Haitigate! No doubt, the US government is free to do as it pleases and it does. On the subject of corruption in Britain suffice it to say that those scandals which are uncovered and reported in the media are the tip of the iceberg and that the Official Secrets Act can have no place in a true democracy. There's no denying that politics by its very nature requires compromising one's principles to a great extent and thus corruption is always a possibility. Maybe, in Bangladesh it is accepted as almost inevitable and dealt with openly, in the West there is hypocrisy and smugness. Compared with Washington, or London's corruption and crime records, Dhaka's is very naive — to say the least.

Of course, there are many problems here such as poverty and suffering on a scale unseen in the West since the last century. But those who protest the loudest are not poor. They live in houses kept spotlessly clean by servants who also cook and look after their children for them, (unheard of in the West unless you are very wealthy), and so are in a position to do something about the numerous grievances they have about their country. Those they complain about — usually the uneducated masses — are not in such a position. They are stuck in a system not always of their own making, powerless and talked down to by their 'superiors', and trying to survive in a hostile world where even the innocence of childhood is a luxury.

The first step towards self-improvement is to be positive. Jingoism must not be condoned, but is there something wrong with taking a little pride in your own country and city? And perhaps even occasionally noticing the good things about life here? The irony of the matter is that while people here believe that life in the West is something to aspire for, in the West people are realising that something has been lost that the East still possesses. Ancient and unique cultures are still valued, artisanship and craftsmanship are still widespread, the utmost hospitality is offered by rich and poor alike, there is importance placed on the family and the elderly are respected and looked after. Most importantly, technology and mass consumerism have not yet replaced God as idols to worship blindly. And television has not yet become the opium of the masses.

However there are causes to be wary. It is better to make the most of what is left because it's changing all too rapidly. Those who visit from the West are often quite disturbed to see the extent of cultural imposition, done quite unnaturally, on the East. In the face of such global conformation, as we are witnessing today, defeatism and pessimism are killers of cultures. It is all too easy to yield to the new imperialism. It has been designed to be too easy, to appeal to the most basic instincts for comfort and security through material possessions. But a strong and affirmative vision is required for the future. Don't be a party to the murder of your own culture.

Ghatak Dalal Nirmul Jatiya Samannaya Committee held a rally in front of the Taher auditorium in the city yesterday.

Half of rural households to get sanitation facilities

The government will bring 50 per cent of the total rural households under sanitation coverage by June next. Taka 50 crore will be allocated to support setting up of 25 lakh sanitary latrines in as many houses by the time, reports BSS.

This was decided at a high-powered inter-ministerial meeting held at the NEC Bhaban yesterday. Finance Minister M Saifur Rahman was in the chair. State Minister for Planning Dr A Moyeen Khan also spoke on the occasion.

So far 35 per cent of the rural areas have been brought under the sanitation coverage. As per decision of the meeting, the government would provide Tk. 200 to each person who will set up one sanitary latrine under the 'accelerated sanitation extension support programme' of the government.

Each latrine costs Tk 500 only. The finance minister directed the authorities concerned to set up at least two sanitary latrines in each school, madrasahs and one in each mosque.

He said members of the police force, Ansar, VDP, scouts would also be given government support if they wish to set up sanitary latrines in their village homes.

The finance minister said, if needed, each of the 4.5 million members of Ansars and VDP, one lakh members of the police force, as well as the NGOs would be given government support in phases in this regard.

He stressed the intensive motivational campaign through social mobilisation to create public awareness about the need of the proper sanitation.

The finance minister said money would not be a problem for this social programme, and the government had already spent Tk. 110 crore to set up 18 lakh sanitary latrines in the rural areas of the country. The government has also plans to spend Tk 200 crore more to set up additional 30 lakh latrines by the year 2000, he added.

It was informed in the meeting that 25000 tonnes human excreta are being deposited in the open everyday. The death toll of children by diarrhoea in the country is 262000 each year.

Representatives from ministries concerned, Asian Development Bank, UNICEF and NGOs attended the meeting.
