Legislators from 18 nations call for more openness at IMF, WB

WASHINGTON, Dec 5: Leg islators from 18 nations joined US House of Representatives mbers in an unusual oneday session devoted to pressing for more openness in the dealings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, says USIS

The meeting was chaired by Congressman Barney Frank, himself and advocate of greater openness at the institutions. Under Secretary of the Treasury for International Affairs Lawrence Summers, in a luncheon speech to the group. supported the call for fuller disclosure by the institutions, saying that 200 years of US history have shown the value of transparency in government and institutional life.

Typical of the complaints voiced during the late November discussions was that of pointed out that some documents are never released from the IMF archives, no matter

In addition to archive materials, access to more recent "programme documents" is essential for legislators with economic policy oversight responsibilities. Sachs said. These should be made available 6 to 12 months after they are prepared, he argued. These documents are "the tools you need to do your job, and you don't currently have them," he told the legislators.

Under Secretary Summers focused his comments particularly on IMF disclosure practices. "You can argue about the particular dimensions of what has happened with policy in Africa over the last 15 years, but nobody who is morally sensitive can be satisfied with the results of what the international financial institutions have done, what the result of the economic development effort has been," he said. "If we are going to improve that effort we have to understand what it's been. We have to understand what polices have been pursued, why they have been pursued, and what the results have been, what the calculations were that went into their formulation."

Summers acknowledged the need to respect agreements with governments on confidentiality, particularly on such sensitive topics as exchange rate policy, but he added that still leaves "a great deal of room for review of what happened, and for using that review to drive what happens."

Summers welcomed some moves toward fuller disclosure already implemented by the World Bank, particularly the opening last January of a Public Information Centre. The centre responds to requests from interested parties for a variety of documents ranging from staff appraisal reports and environmental assessments to descriptions of individual bank projects.

Under this programme, according to Summers, the Bank has received 7,100 requests from community groups for information concerning projects in preparation.
