2 UK charities slam Summit agenda

Two British charities Sunday attacked the basic tenets of development aid to the Third World and to children, on the eve of the opening of the UN development summit in Copenhagen, report agencies.

The UK-based Save the Children Fund (SCF) warned that any abrupt attempt to ban child labour would impact negatively in the societies and the economies of the developing as well as the developed nations.

"Abrupt attempt to ban child labour on the assumption that this will be good for children may be a major mistake if children's work is essential to family income, or if children are gaining a positive feeling of value and productivity," said SCF in a statement issued in London.

Director General-designate of the SCF and currently Overseas Director of the organisation, Mike Aaronson, issued the note of warning at a press conference on Sunday, a day ahead of the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen which takes up the child labour issue. The humanitarian organisation's Dhaka office, in a press release vesterday quoted Aaronson as having said that the Copenhagen summit, which began yesterday, would fail to find a successful new formula for social development because it ignores children's active role in society.

In the world meet, the developed nations will put pressure for adopting a resolution banning child labour and for compulsory registration of trade unions.

But the developing countries have said the measures would put heavy strains on their economies and hinder development.

Against this backdrop, the SCF said. "Policy-makers of the summit remain ignorant of children's real lives and therefore unable to invest effectively in the people on whom social advancement depends - the rising genera-

"The World Bank understands that it has gone wrong but seems reluctant to ensure that past mistakes are properly corrected. In effect, the bank is not practising what it preaches," Christian Aid said in its statement, adding that the policies were "hurting."

"Economic assistance needs to be born again in a way that will genuinely work for the poor," it said.

Boutros-Ghali underlined the need to fight against greed and indifference, and the need for tolerance.

He also told a packed hall that the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) must play a strong role in eradicating poverty, creating jobs and integrating societies, the three main goals of the summit.

Bretton Woods institutions to participate fully in the social action that we are in the process of redefining and reinventing here," he said.

AP adds: Three years in the planning, the summit has encountered withering criticism even before its opening for mustering only vague, watereddown plans for tackling apocalyptic problems.

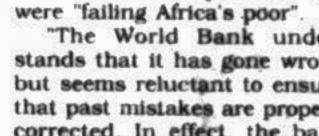

The United Nations hopes delegates will compare social programmes, learn from each other's experiences and sign documents which groups can use to pressure their national leaders.

Although calling on the support of non-governmental organizations and private enterprise, Boutros-Ghali emphasized the summit theme that the ultimate responsibility for fighting poverty lies with indiyidual countries. "States are primarily responsible for setting in motion dynamic social policies."

In his speech, Boutros-Ghali didn't refer to the stickiest issues of foreign aid and debt relief. Many countries, including the United States, already have said they won't make any promises on those points.
