The Daily Star

VIAGAZINE

Dhaka, Friday, November 17, 1995

Booker '95

Bookmakers' Favourite Rushdie loses to Pat Barker

NGLISH novelist Pat Barker, writer of a haunting trilogy about World War one, fought off a fierce challenge from Indian born Salman Rushdie on November 7 win Britain's top literary prize.

Barker a 52-year-old fects it had on society. former teacher from northern England whose first novel was not published until she was 39 landed the 20,000 pound (31,650 dollar) Booker Prize for "The Ghost Road."

It intermingled fact with fiction in the talek of a working class lieutenant battling the horrors of the trenches alongside poet Wilfred Owen.

Recalling the psychological scars of the conflict, she told reporters Shell Shock was misunderstood as a failure of manliness. This was part of the torment the men suffered.

Barker, facing the literary equivalent of Hollywood Oscar night said she was sick of hearing her own voice and thanked her competitors for their friendly attitude, and for writing such wonderful books. Rushdie, under threat of death from Iran for blasphemy had been the hottest favourite in the 27-year-history of the prestigious prize. Bookmakers considered him a certainty to win with The Moor's Last Sigh.

But Barker, the first woman to land the Booker since A S Byatt in 1990 emerged the winner after hours of heated debate by the

FASHION

and brand-conscious

▲ middle-class is encouraging the growth of a fashion industry in Bangladesh.

Fashion shows in Dhaka are not. however, a '90s phenomenon; in 1987 a group of women, mostly from the upper classes organised

Ekram Kabir

organised fashion shows have enjoyed considerable success.

Maheen Khan, Bibi Russel and a few others seem to be really dedicated to promote the concept of "looking-nice" at all levels of the society.

With such professionals working hard, the fashion industry appears ready to manager of Aarong — was the creative inspiration behind

Aarong's glitzy, first-ever professional designer-wears show at Sonargaon Hotel late last month. Twenty high-heeled models, most of them new faces, catwalked down the bamboo-made stage draped in the latest creations said that she primarily listens to what Aarong's patrons, want, the stamp of the designers' brain and imagination was much noticeable.

Although Maheen Khan

Maheen Khan — design

In the '90s, professionally a fashion show.

take off.

of Maheen.

She said the lesson of World War one shouldn't be forgotten. I wanted to get people not just to think about the horrors of it but to actually think quite deeply about why it happened and the ef-

Barker was a teacher who "lived on a diet of rejection slips before her first novel Union Street's was published in 1982. It was later made into a film Stanley and Iris starring Jane Fonda and Robert de Niro — not a happy adaptation for her.

But she really won literary acclaim with her three books on World War one, culminating in The Ghost Road, published by Viking Press at 15 pounds (23.69 dollars).

Barker who drew much inspiration from her grandfather's tales of the trenches. said the somme is like the holocaust. It revealed things about mankind that we cannot come to terms with and cannot forget. It can never become the past.

Under the media spotlight after her win she said "I didn't think about the critics when I was writing it. If had I would have been paralysed."

Others on the Booker shortlist were Briton Barry Unsworth, South African Justin Cartwright and Australian Tim Winton.

The judges read 141 books by writers from 50 Commonwealth countries and Ireland before picking their shortlist. — Reuter not just one of those leggy shows, but was meant for two purposes: to make dressmaking more professional and to raise funds for artisans who can no longer perform or work. "It was also a sort of preparation for Aarong's Eid collections," people gathered to witness displays in western countries

"I was very excited and tense because this was the first-ever show that I designed and presented on behalf of Aarong. I had to make sure nothing went wrong during show-time, and of course, the Bandwagon was there to support me," Maheen told The Daily Star during a brief dialogue two days

Saeed Ahmed choreographed the orchestrated display.

Bandwagon seemed very much at ease. "During the show, we were mostly marking how the Bandwagontrained models were performing," said Mou and boundary in the field of fashion, it's a sort of stream changing its direction all the time; and sometimes, it

Since there is no defined

Moushumi Nasser and after the show.

- there were no oohs and aahs from the audience.

About 400 nicely-dressed said the Aarong designer.

Bangladeshi Fashion: Ready to Take off the same.

catwalk stage.

nomenon. For example, the fashion of the '50s or the '60s is not the same as what it is today. Times have changed.

tastes are different, and above all, the people are not antee that the fashion of yesteryears may not come back with a sudden change in people's taste. "It won't be of our country wearing what Suchitra Sen once wore and men following Uttam Kumar," said Mou who used to be a leading model on Dhaka aspect of fashion, Maheen said, "Yes, it can happen quite frequently." Maheen often makes foreign tours to sit before the catwalk footlights in order to enhance her vision with newer blends.

ion shows are necessary for proach. For instance, displays as such are organised all over the world to introduce new designs and styles which reflect not only a country's culture, but also the taste of different social groups within that country. "In this way, interested people can know what is and are coming in the future," said Maheen. The Aarong designer graduated in Fashion Design from Brooks the product-oriented ap-

In Maheen's opinion, fash-

Explaining this cyclic

But again, there's no guar-

The October 26 fanfare was works as an upstream phethe show. Unlike catwalk surprising to see the women

Author Pat Barker holds her novel, The Ghost Road, at London's Guildhall on November 7 after the 52-year-old mother-of-two from Durham won the 20,000 Booker Prize ahead of the favourite, Salman Rushdie. - AFP/UNB

College, LA, California and received a Diploma in Textile Design from the Fashion Institute of Design and Mer-

After completion of these chandising also in California.

certificate courses, she attended the Parsons School of Design and got her Bachelor degree in Textile and Surface Pattern Design. This was a school specialising in fashion and interior design. There must be a concept behind every work, not just in fashion but in all as such," said Maheen, adding: "And that's the reason why we setforth a couple of themes to display our collections." The Future

'96, therefore, focused on ten different themes with four of them being the portrayal of world's deteriorating envion her concept since May this year: step by step, the fabrics and jewellery were added to match the garments. The concept contained the idea that every single thing - from hairpin to shoes - should be local and matched with the designed-wears. The theatrical-manner display was full of such materials. For example:

in Seven Seas, Sahara, Air and Amazon, she wanted a global focus, and for that matter, the matching materials had to be able to convey the Continued on page 12

Maheen started working

ronment

Unacknowledged Debts

Waheedul Haque

HAKA before World War 2 was quite a town. Mofassil it was perhaps but not in the sense of a straggler trying to catch up with times. For, if anything, it was abreast of the best of intellectual things and of the world and the bravest of the subcontinent's anti-colonial fights had its origin here. Dhaka was still carrying on the Shaista Khan tradition being the cheapest place to live, with food and housing and environment, guaranteed. And although one had even to go to Bhattashali's Nimtoli museum to see a piece of true Muslim fabric. Dhaka was still then carrying on gloriously with the tradi-

Strangely enough well into the new century Bengali Muslim surplus farmers preferred sending their scions to far off Aligarh rather than to Dhaka. The attraction lay in that university's endeavours to live up to a part of its name — Aligarh Muslim University.

tion of producing the best sa rees and white Mulmul best of jewellery specially silver filigree artefacts.

The intellectual brilliance of the place topped this as does a De Beers diamond to a bracelet. No need to hark back to hoary past and exhume Atish Dipankar et al The nineteenth century galaxy of thinkers writers and artists ending up with Sir Jagadish, Bhai Girish Sen and Atul Prasad who rose from around Dhaka, reads like a Bengali Who's Who. And the mantle was borne with no mean merit by Satyen Bose, Buddadev Bose, Jibananda and a host of others in the 20th century.

By the end of the second decade of the new century a new thing came into Dhaka's life. A new dimension opened. And who could guess. This academic outfit was going to affect most forcefully the social cultural and political life of the region and its people. The Dhaka University materialised in 1921 as a consolation for the assorted Muslim feudal aristocrats - most of them not quite Bangalees - who had realised their dream of East Bengal only to lose it in the sixth year of the 1905 vivisection of a very much living Bengal. The university was to act as the catalytic agent for the social development of a backward and illiterate Bengali Muslim community.

How far was that goal attained? As an institution of higher education and a seat of learning both deep and lofty the Dhaka University left no room for improvement. Its faculties were staffed by the very best scholars and teachers of the day and during the able leadership of Herzog and Langley, the small family did left to be desired by way of administration. Professor Abdur Razzak's taking the university for an unending ride was possible because of the plus points of the place and not ot erwise.

But establishing a well-appointed and well-serviced university is one thing and a great university is quite another. This residential unithe Bengali Muslim community — amidst them the uni versity was situated and for fish out of water. Mere opensyce and babarchi-khansama to transform into a new class ferred sending their scions to far off Aligarh rather than to Dhaka. The attraction lay in that university's endeavours to live up to a part of its name - Aligarh Muslim University. A culturally starved, almost suppressed- community was then catching at anything allowing them to assert their identity and existenced Mohammedan Sporting club and Abbasuddin's songs Dhaka University in contrast offered at best a secular image with a predominant non-Muslim presence among both alumni and the Teaching staff.

By the thirties many more Muslim students were threnging village schools. And most of their parents had no opening but the DU to send their wards to - only the rich could afford Aligarh and the charm of the place was wearing off fast in the eye of a Muslim literati finding in Fazlul Huq and Suhrawardy their models rather than anachronistic Islamic zealots. After all the fast overtaking Pakistani separatist movement was a political campaign to land the backword and impoverished Bengali Muslim on a materially as well as socially superior ground — very very far from having any religious or revivalistic or Pan-Islamist elements in it. Sons of Muslim peasants and weavers started to cross the lither to forbidding portals of DU. Salimullah Muslim Hall, to whose creation the much celebrated British titled merchant — Nawab did not contribute anything compared to what Kishorilal Jubilee of Balaiti did for Jagannath Hall - was made into a little Aligarh by the enthusiasm of the early Muslim throngs to the DU.

But SM Hall was expensive

By the end of the second decade of the new century a new thing came into Dhaka's life.

A new dimension opened. And who could guess. This academic outfit was going to affect most forcefully the social cultural and political life of the region and its people.

for the size of the peasant pockets. Not all parents could afford Hall hostelry for their sons. And this residential hall for Muslim students was specially expensive be cause of imported Aligarh dandyism. That streak of upstart foppishness has by and by blossomed into a main characteristic of the hedonist-consumerist ideals of Bangladesh of the nineties.

Where did then the ambitious sons of the soil go? Well for two full generations most Muslim undergraduates of DU stayed and ate at the house of who they have been derisively calling kuttis or small people - the local Dhakaites. The members of this pidgin-urdu speaking sub-culture have many sterling qualities some of which have long been celebrated by people not belonging to the fold such as their wit. But possibly the best in them was brought out in their interaction with the so-called lodging master in the home. They loved and respected the follow from the villages - the mutsaal or Mr Master — to a point of absurdity. The hosts were all indeed small people - earn

Old Dhaka — 1952, Watercolour

What was the undergraduate — at first shy and flabbergasted - expected to do to justify the regular regaling with food he hasn't even had in his dreams? Could he. after his own studies take care of the little ones in the house? Howmuchever he can do without harming his own pursuit, would do. An educated person was an angel in the house.

modious ancestral houses.

all the world.

But with the biggest heart in Such adulation not infrequently ended in unending lifelong ties between the scholar and his benefator's family, and there are instances galore of this being consecrated by betrothal. Thus the lodging master and his worshipping hosts started an intercourse yielding most wholesome cultural, social and, yes, political results.

The small world of the Dhakaiya small man widened and his xenophobic blinkers lifted — and he was not that illiterate stooge of the Nawab and his base -panchayet anymore. As for the shy youth from the village his entry into civilisation and values and practices urbane was mainly through the courtesy of the Dhakaite family. DU did not quite live up to its early promise. A university where Haraprasad Shastri. RC. Majumdar Kalikaranjan Sanungo, Satyen Bose and IC Ghose taught could not come to mean much in intellectual terms. Nevertheless, it came to be through which the aspirations of the repressed and deprived people of East Bengal—now Bangladesh breathed DU became the main shaper of the social and political reality of Bangladesh.

The Language movement of 1952, the anti-Ayub movement of 1962, the mass upsurge of 1969 were all handcrafted by DU students. All be if at the hub of it all wasn't that wonderful thing cemented by the tie of love and respected between the kutti householder and his mutsaab when in 1948 the students first moved for Bangla as a state language it simply fizzled. The aborted movement failed to evince local Dhakkaya support. By '52 the mutsaabs had broken down the resistance simply through telling the Urduspeaking locals that it was they who demanded a fair deal for Bangla. The students can do no wrong, believed the general run of Dhakaiya population.

The continuing success of the Language Movements and its many spin-offs enmeshed the mixed-culture populace more and more with the living magic of Bengali literature and the Bengali way of life in general.

The door was opened for a meaningful and fetching integration. It was left to Sheikh Mulibur Rahman to transform this cradle of Muslim League, bulwark sectarian communal reaction into the citadel of the politics of Bengali nationalism. All through winning over the true Dhaka people. General Pershing, on liberating Paris from German occupation at the end of World War I, said, we come to pay our debts, Lafayette. When will all Bangladesh know and acknowledge its debts to the small men of Dhaka — the Dhakaiya.

The paintings, used in this article, are by our leading artist Abdur Razzak who early this year put up an exhibition of his watercolour paintings and pencil sketches on Dhaka, the city he has seen over the past 40 years and felt its changes.

