LONDON, Mar 28: Many large retail banks in Europe and North America will have to cut their workforces by up to half within the next 10 years, according to a report to be published here next week. They should do it quickly rather than gradually if they want to maintain the commitment of their employees and the reputation of their brand names, says the report by the economist intelligence unit and management consultants Coopers and Lybrands. Banks will have to cut the costs of their existing operations if they are to be able to pay for big investments in new products and services, argues the study, which is entitled "Building tomorrow's leading retail bank," reports AFP.

The task of reviving economy

By Wahiduddin Mahmud

A future government will have an enormous task at hand in averting an economic nomic stability. downslice and putting the economy back on track. This task becomes increasingly difficult day by day as the political confrontation is prolonged. A 'damage management' strategy for the economy will need to address a number of immediate policy concerns, such as reactivating the export sector. stabilising the foodgrain market, replenishing the supply of essential imports, restoring the fiscal and trade balance. ensuring the viability of financial institutions and strengthening income-generating programmes for the poor. The export sector, particularly the garment industry, will need every possible support Infrastructural, logistic and financial - to tide over their losses and retain foreign markets. Other sectors including small entrepreneurs and traders will also need credit support in order to replenish their working capital and remain in business. Ensuring uninterrupted supply of fuel. power and imported industrial inputs will also be crucial for reactivating the economy.

Much of the business losses caused by the economic turmoil will have to be borne by the country's banking system. at least in the short run. The banking system is already too fragile to withstand a fresh wave of loan defaults on top of the existing large overhang of bad loans. The central bank will have to devise a policy package for maintaining the liquidity and profitability of the banking system without at the same time jeopardising financial discipline and macroeco-

The macroeconomic stabilisation already looks fragile with increasing inflation, dwindling foreign reserves and growing strains in the government's fiscal and monetary management. Agricultural stagnation, rising fiscal deficits and a slowdown in export growth underlie these macroeconomic strains that may become more severe in the coming months, unless strong remedial measures can be put in place.

The level of forex reserves, which peaked at 3.5 billion dollars in April '95, has been depleted by more than I billion dollars since then. This unprecedented depletion of reserves has been caused by an import boom that is not sustainable, particularly in view ofthe declining trends in export earnings. The current disruptions in export will exacerbate the balance of payments problem, thus making the policy options even more difficult. A substantial devaluation of Taka would be needed to increase export competitiveness and restore that trade balance. but this would also add to the domestic inflationary pressure There are other less attractive alternatives such as to undertake contractionary monetary and fiscal measures or even to reintroduce quantitative import controls. Contractionary macroeconomic policies can jeopardise the prospects of an economic revival.

There are worrying signs of fiscal strains that can have a destabilising effect on the macroeconomy. The domestic public debt has been increasing in the current fiscal in the face of increasing budgetary deficits and lagging foreign aid disbursement. While there is a need for belt-tightening by the government in respect of current spending, the implementation of development projects will have to be geared up to support income and employment generation.

The demand-supply balance for foodgrains will remain precarious at least until the next Aman harvest. Because of the disruptions in the supply of fertiliser and fuel in the current Boro season, total foodgrain production during 1985-86 may be even lower than the previous year's extremely poor harvest of 18 million. tons. The import target of about 2.5 million tons for 1985-86, which is slightly lower than the actual of the previous year, may thus be inadequate.

Although the government's present foodgrain stocks of about 1 million tons may seem adequate, the stocks held by farmers and traders are likely to have been severely depleted by successive bad harvests. In the face of declining food aid availability and uncertain prospects for grain imports by private traders, much will depend on the government's ability to make timely arrangements for import and distribution of foodgrains.

GENEVA, Mar 28: World merchandise trade volume rose by eight per cent in 1995 and value of trade in goods and services went over 6,000 billion dollars for the first time. the World Trade Organisation (WTO) reported today, says

NEW YORK, Mar 28: Singapore has the most secure banking system in the world's newly industrialised economies, with Hong Kong second, financial rating agency Standard and Poor's said yesterday, reports AFP.

Singapore's system is "at par with or better than that of many mature industrialised countries," said Standard and Poor's Managing Director Roger Taillon in a report.

Hong Kong has "slightly more economic and industry risk" but the agency does not expect the reversion to China in 1997 to have "significant repercussions.

Chile, Malaysia and Israel were emerging economies with solid banking systems said the report.

Taillon warned however that "risk of sudden banking industry deterioration or individual bank collapse, even where banks are doing well, is still much higher in an emerging market or newly industrialised country than in a mature, industrialised country's
