The Growing Dish Culture

By A.S.M Nurunnabi

Our urban society, particularly in big cities, is facing a new phenomenon: fast growth of satellite dish culture. It seems to be the latest development in the field of visual entertainment. Its precursors were the VCRs and VCPs which flooded the market in the eighties and the early part of the nineties. Guardians of our social mores were critical of the impact that these electronic gadgets could inflict in the cultural and aesthetic arena of the nation. They had good reason for being so. There was absolutely no control on the entry of the video films that served as fodder to these new vehicles of entertainment. As a result, video films of all varieties — good, bad and forbidden even by Western standards — were available in plenty in the video shops that mushroomed in the city as elsewhere in the country.

According to serious observers of our society, the unrestricted entry of alien video films containing pornographic and abominable crime episodes exercised deleterious effects on the morals of the young generation and finally gave rise to horrific criminal activities. All this has played an important role in eroding our traditional values, culture and ways of life. In the opinion of critics, there were ample evidence of the ominous impact of these phenomena on the increased incidence of crimes and violence in the city, as elsewhere.

The VCRs and VCPs had their heyday not for a long period. They suffered a significant setback from another electronic invader: the satellite dish antenna which was initially available to the financially solvent citizenry. There are now fierce debate over whether the latest device has initiated the process of dismantling and mauling the vestiges of our cultural and ethical values. But no doubt, the dish antenna installed on rooftops of affluent homes of the city became an eloquent symbol of elevated status of those homeowners.

The dish antenna has now come to the plebeian level with the introduction of the so-called cable service, run in most cases by owners of video shops which have now been going through a lean period of business. At present all the important neighbourhoods of the city inhabited by TV owners, have their TVs fitted with cable connection. Though initial investment for such facility and the monthly charge for it vary from one place to another in the city, they are considered affordable by most TV owners, considering the wide variety and attractions of the different programmes available through the cable service.

This new facility is now being so widely used by privileged sections of the city dwellers for enjoying foreign TV programmes, telecast almost day and night, that the daily newspapers of the city allot a good portion of their space to the printing of the daily programmes of the different foreign TV channels. Against the inroad of these foreign TV programmes, the local TV programmes seem to have no defence, because the latter appear to be insipid and monotonous. There are many cases where the TV owners of the city equipped with cable service remain constantly tuned to the foreign channels.
