

He is known as Mr Copper

NEW YORK, June 15: He was known by fellow traders as Mr. Copper, reports AP.

They called him the most powerful player in the multi-billion dollar world market — able to move copper prices with huge transactions that sometimes involved hundreds of millions of dollars.

Now, though, far less flattering superlatives are used to describe Yasuo Hamanaka, the former head copper trader at Japan's Sumitomo Corp.

Accused mastermind of one of the biggest financial frauds ever cover-up artist who hid an estimated 1.8 billion dollars in losses from his employer.

Sumitomo Corp., the leading player in the global copper business, said Thursday Hamanaka admitted falsifying the company's books for 10 years to conceal his cover-up from the company. The size of the loss makes it the biggest ever blamed on the unauthorized activities of a single trader.

As fellow players in copper markets here and abroad reflected Friday on Hamanaka's sudden downfall, a common theme emerged.

"Everyone was familiar with him," said a trader in the copper floor of the New York Mercantile Exchange. If his name was mentioned as the trader behind a big transaction, "it would make me quiver."

"He was the most feared man in the copper market," said another New York trader. "In copper as in any physical commodity, whoever controls the chips in the game controlled the way things proceeded."

These traders spoke on condition they not be identified by name because their employers had banned them from discussing the Sumitomo scandal — an indication of the company's influence.

The downfall of Hamanaka, 48, was just the latest financial scandal to hit a big world corporation.

Lanka announces ambitious plan to invest $2b in southern region

COLOMBO, June 15: Sri Lanka announced yesterday an ambitious plan to invest up to two billion dollars in the island's southern region, a hot bed of unemployment and the birth place of two leftist anti-government insurrections, reports AFP.

The head of the Southern Development Authority (SDA) Navin Goneratne said they hoped to make the investments in the next five years and expected nearly 75 per cent of the money to come from local and foreign private sectors.

There has been a lack of co-ordination in implementing development projects in the region, Goneratne told reporters here. The south has been one of the most neglected areas of the country.

Leftist militants staged a failed insurrection in 1971 and attempted another between 1988 and 1990 when they were put down in a violent crackdown.

The country's top bureaucrat, Kusumarsi Balapatabend who is the secretary to President Chandrika Kumaratunga said the Southern Development Authority had priority to push through several schemes to enhance employment.

The reason for the youth unrest in the south was because there was no planned development activities in the area, one bureaucrat said.

Good harvest for China's summer grain depends on weather

BELING, June 15: A good harvest for China's summer grain is in sight if there are no abnormal weather changes in the coming days, according to an official with the Ministry of Agriculture, reports Xinhua.

He forecasts that the summer grain output will be same as last year, or up a little, adding that the exact output still depends on the weather conditions in the next few weeks.

China produced 106.55 billion kilograms of summer grain last year.

The southern parts of China have finished reaping, while the northern parts are fully occupied with gathering in crops.

The official noted that wheat suffered lodging or began to sprout in some parts of the middle and lower reaches of the Yangtze river, which experienced cloudy days over the past few days.

According to the State Bureau of Meteorology, north China will enjoy sunny and cloudy days during June 12-16, which will be good for harvest.

The official also said that a dry-hot wind did not occur this year.

The drought and low temperatures in the early days did not cause a big loss to wheat growth, either, the official added.

He predicted the output of oil-bearing crops is likely to be the second highest in history but that of cotton will somewhat decrease.

In most years summer grain accounts for some 20 per cent of the year's total.

China plans to produce 465 million tons of grain this year, the same as last year.

However, Barshefsky said,

Regulators begin to dissect Sumitomo copper scandal

WASHINGTON, June 15: Around the world, regulators moved Friday to calm copper markets thrown into turmoil by a Sumitomo Corp. disclosure that a rogue trader hid up to 1.8 billion dollars in losses, reports AP.

In London, Britain's Serious Fraud Office and local police opened a fraud investigation.

The activity comes after Sumitomo, a giant Japanese company with 152 billion dollars in sales last year, disclosed that its powerful copper trader, Yasuo Hamanaka, 48, falsified the company's books and records to cover up losses over a 10-year period.

The disclosure jolted the world's copper markets. On the London Metal Exchange, the contract for delivery in three months dropped as low as 1,860 dollars a metric ton, down from 2,145 dollars at the close of trading Thursday. It later recovered partly to 1,980 dollars.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

The fall of copper prices worries me because it reduces our fiscal income," Finance Minister Eduardino Anibal told a news conference in Santiago.

Sumitomo didn't directly deal on the Comex or any US commodities markets, although its activities certainly affected global copper prices. Regulators and traders both here and abroad were counting on Sumitomo's promise to stand fully behind its trades and other obligations.

Regulators said they weren't concerned that US firms active in the London market, such as Merrill Lynch and Co, would be damaged.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

The fall of copper prices worries me because it reduces our fiscal income," Finance Minister Eduardino Anibal told a news conference in Santiago.

Sumitomo didn't directly deal on the Comex or any US commodities markets, although its activities certainly affected global copper prices. Regulators and traders both here and abroad were counting on Sumitomo's promise to stand fully behind its trades and other obligations.

Regulators said they weren't concerned that US firms active in the London market, such as Merrill Lynch and Co, would be damaged.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations is in London, where Hamanaka's trading was heaviest. Britain's Serious Fraud Office, which probes complex financial crimes, announced it was opening an investigation of the Sumitomo matter after discussions with Britain's main financial markets regulator, the Securities and Investment Board.

Ceinwen Jones, a spokeswoman at the Serious Fraud Office, declined to provide further details or say if Hamanaka was a target of the probe. The London Metals Exchange, where 94 per cent of the world's copper is traded, and the Securities and Investment Board said they were investigating the copper markets, in cooperation with the CFTC.

"We don't have any discomfort in terms of anything concerning the US broker-dealers," said a senior Washington regulator, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Traders in New York said they suffered relatively few losses compared to their counterparts overnight in London, where traders are free to borrow money to play the market.

Regulators say the focus of their investigations