JU phone system in dire straits

By JU Correspondent

Teachers, students and employees of Jahangirnagar University (JU) are likely to face serious sufferings as the university's telecommunication system is on the verge of total collapse.

Some 300 telephones under the JU telephone exchange are out of order, causing serious inconveniences to the teachers, students and the employees of the university.

The age-old telephone exchange system often becomes inoperative, cutting off the university from the rest of the country.

The university authority bought the rejected telephone exchange from the T and T Board in 1982 and installed it following repairs.

The exchange malfunctions as it is burdened with some 300 telephones, almost double its normal capacity of 170 telephones.

At present, the lone card phone on the campus is also out of order.

Though the authority has already taken steps to install a new telephone exchange, the process is being delayed due to shortage of adequate funds, according to the officials.
