eradication of poverty eradication of poverty eradication of poverty eradication of poverty eradication of poverty

Since the creation of the United Nations in 1945, great strides have been made in alleviating poverty. Yet poverty remains significant in different parts of the world. The number of poor people has grown amid plenty. The gap between rich and poor has widened, both within countries and between developed countries and developing countries, especially the least developed countries (LDCs).

In order to promote public awareness of the need to eradicate poverty and destitution in all countries, particularly in developing countries, the General Assembly of the United Nations through a resolution 47/196 adopted on 22 December 1992, has designated 17 October as the International Day for the Eradication of Poverty. Two years later, in 1994, through another UNGA resolution, 1996 has been proclaimed the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty.

Poverty and peaceful development are incompatible. Poverty eradication has therefore become a top priority for UNDP in 1990s. UNDP supports national capacity building and facilitates countries' own efforts for overcoming poverty. Its first and foremost aim is to assist governments and organizations of civil society in developing economic and social policies and programmes that benefit people living in poverty.

Every minute of every day, 47 babies are born into poverty, one in every five people, numbering over one billion—the majority of whom are women, children, the elderly, disabled, indigenous people, migrants and refugees—subsist on less than one dollar a day each.

With fifty percent of its population living below the poverty line Bangladesh faces an enormous challenge of alleviating poverty. Following the goals set out in Rio in 1992, in Copenhagen and in Beijing in 1995, UNDP-Bangladesh has also reoriented its intervention towards poverty alleviation, putting human development at the centre of all its approaches and programmes.

To mark the International Day for the Eradication of Poverty, on 17 October, UNDP-Bangladesh pledges to support the Government and civil society in their efforts against poverty and unemployment and pursuing successfully a pro-poor, pro-women, pro-environment, pro-employment agenda.

David E. Lockwood
UNDP Resident Representative & UN Resident Coordinator

Today marks the International Day for the Eradication of Poverty. On this day, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) re-dedicates itself to a decade-long, global effort to replace hunger, helplessness and despair with opportunity, hope and the promise of a better future. Poverty places an intolerable burden on the human spirit. We cannot accept that it will always be with us. The modern world has the resources, the know-how and the expertise to relegate poverty to the pages of history.

That is why UNDP, with the enthusiastic backing of our Executive Board, has made the fight against world poverty its central and overriding priority. UNDP now spends nearly 90 percent of its core resources in countries with 90 per cent of the world's poorest people. We have committed the full force of all our energies to the greatest human challenge of our time—an effort which will also galvanize and energize the various efforts of the United Nations around a great and just cause.

Picture a moment what being poor really means—beyond the vast numbers of nameless, faceless people who many think live only in faraway places. Poverty is a hungry and thirsty child who cannot understand why there is no food and no water. Poverty is an elderly woman with no heat in winter, a woman with a lifetime of hard work behind her and only a damp chill as her reward. Poverty is a fisherman whose waters—and livelihood—have been spoiled by pollution through no fault of his own. But being poor is more than a lack of food, shelter and livelihoods. Poverty means marginalization—the exclusion of millions of people of countries, rich and poor, from the benefits of progress. Poverty also means polarization—the growing gap between the haves and the have-nots, both between countries and within countries.

Inequities breed joblessness and hopelessness, anger and despair—and all too often violence and conflict. The world must make a place for everyone to share in its bounty. And the poor need more control over the forces shaping their lives. They need the opportunity to lift themselves out of poverty and social exclusion and enter a world of equity and justice.

The income gap between the richest and poorest 20 per cent of the world's people has not been narrowing in the past 30 years. It has, in fact, doubled. Each day, 68,000 people join the ranks of the poor—families living on less than one dollar a day. Let us ask ourselves what the future could possibly hold for the children in these families.

The goal to eradicate extreme poverty is not some lofty idealism when we see how many industrial countries over the course of this century have done just that. In this sense, conquering poverty is not just a moral imperative but a feasible objective.

With the spirit of the 1995 Copenhagen World Summit of Social Development as our guide and inspiration, UNDP is helping to forge a world partnership geared to replacing poverty with equity. We have set our goals to provide sustainable livelihoods, to advance the well-being of women and to regenerate the environment.

UNDP offices throughout the world are sponsoring and organizing events to observe the International Day for the Eradication of Poverty. The activities, which take place during the week of 17-24 October, are designed to encourage and assist governments and their people to develop national poverty eradication strategies as well as plans of actions which are comprehensive, participatory and realistic.

Within the framework, UNDP is working with governments to help them identify the nature and scope of poverty in their respective countries. We are supporting initiatives that provide equitable access to assets including skills, credit, jobs and sustainable livelihoods, land and environmental resources, linkages to national and international markets and information systems, citizenship rights and legal rights for women and minorities.

The real potential of the next century will not be found in stocks or technology or minerals. The real potential of the future will be found in the three billion people now living in poverty who collectively represent the greatest potential for growth and opportunity the world has ever seen.

Unless we address the problems of poverty now, none of the great goals the international community has set—peace, stability, human rights for all, preservation of the environment—are achievable in a world where one half of the people find themselves shut out of opportunity and the benefits of a global society.

Poverty is the great denier. It denies comfort, dignity, freedom, participation. Today we deny the great denier its handiwork. I call upon every individual who cares about justice and human dignity to join the global campaign to eradicate poverty. We have the know-how. We have the resources. Today, we need the commitment.
