Research shows Stored soyabean oil may lose nutritional quality

Soyabean oil packed in containers gradually loses its nutritional quality if kept in long-term storage and may cause health hazard, reports UNB.

Quality of soyabean oil, stored for more than three months, decreases gradually and at one stage falls below the acceptable level recommended by Bangladesh Standards and Testing Institution (BSTI). The resulting physicochemical changes in oil composition may cause toxic effect on the consumers.

This alarming finding was disclosed by Hossain Uddin Shekhar, Assistant Professor, Biochemistry Department, Dhaka University, who last year carried out a research on some popular brands of soyabean oil in the country.

His work is titled 'Studies on the Effects of Storage Conditions on Physicochemical Characteristics of Soyabean Oils'.

Currently, there is no indication of manufacturing and expiry dates on the containers of soyabean oil sold in the country. As a result, consumers have no way of knowing the quality of oil they buy.

All the ingredients of soyabean oil, stored for more than 90 days, were found at sub-standard level 'due to change in physical and chemical properties of oils,' Shekhar said.

During his 270-day study, the DU researcher maintained both refrigerator temperature and 25 to 40 degree Celsius of the stored oil samples.

When contacted, BSTI officials told UNB that they were not aware of the study by Hossain Uddin Shekhar, published recently in the Bangladesh Journal of Biochemistry, a journal in biochemical sciences.

The BSTI officials, however, said they had tested soyabean oils of different brands at different times and found the quality to be of acceptable standard.

There is a possibility of adulteration of oil at retail selling stage, they said and lamented the limited powers of
