Bhutan, Nepal, India want to make use of port facilities

Massive plan to modernise Mongla

By Govinda Shil back from Khulna

The government has drawn up a massive Tk 500-crore plan to modernise the Mongla Port to prepare it for the fast-rising demand in regional and international maritime trading.

Port officials said that Bhutan, Nepal and India were mounting diplomatic pressure on Bangladesh to allow them to use the port, one of the reasons that prompted the authorities to plan the uplift.

The Rupsa Bridge and opening of the Dhaka-Maoa road will make Mongla Port all the more important, the officials

Set up in 1950, the port han-dled a total of 18.75 metric tonnes of goods (import 15.52 mt and export 3.23 mt) in 1996-97. Some 260 ships arrived at the port to load mainly frozen foods and raw jutes bound for Europe and other destinations.

Mongla will be the principal commercial navigation point for Rajshahi, Khulna, Barisal and Dhaka divisions after the completion of the bridge and the road. These divisions cover more than two thirds of the country's land area.

Under the plan are several key projects which include dredging of the Pussur channel which has been silted for long. replacement of cargo handling equipment, construction of light tower and installation of RACON signalling device at the Fairway buoy.

Officials estimate a cost of Tk 501 crore for the projects to be completed by 2006. Meanwhile, the port's revenue suffered heavily last year.

only Tk 11.69 crore in 1996-97 against Tk 18.49 the previous Sharif Atiqur Rahman, Chairman of the Port Authority, said that he needed a 'dredger' that costs Tk 100-120 vessels with more than sevenmeter draft is difficult. The officials say the river is urgently needed a dredging, from its 'port area' to the 'Hiron point route'. A Shipping Ministry official said the government recently okayed a Tk 40-crore dredging project, responding to the urgency.

The dredging work will begin sometime next May or June. which will remove six lakh cubic meter of silts a year through 2001.

The Chairman said agreements were already signed with entrepreneurs of Singapore and Malaysia who would set up joint-venture cement, palm oil and bitumin plants in the port area. This will increase the use of the port, he said.

Setting up of the proposed Khulna Export Processing Zone, a food silo and a Bangladesh Petroleum Corporation refinery will also increase the port's usefulness. A leading port user said the government needed to get its act together to maximise the use of the port. "Since most of the country's imports is handled by the Chittagong Port, and the draft of Karnafully channel is higher than the Pussur channel, no company takes interest in berthing at Mongla Port," he

He said regular dredging of the Pussur channel was key to keeping the port navigable throughout the year.

A mechanical engineer at Mongla Port says ships come at Mongla because its bed is soft which naturally does not harm the bottom during the low tide when a ship really gets stuck in the mud.

Port officials want some other projects like construction of five jetties, two outer jetties, installation of modern cargo handling equipment, water burge and setting up of an inland container depot (ICD).

Copper and commerce don't click

By Cameron Kennedy

Government and business recognise technology's benefits. but companies can only dream of their own cyberspace shopping malls when their hands are tied by copper wire. At a seminar Monday, Finance Minister SAMS Kibria called on banks and businesses to jump on the hi-tech bandwagon - with fax, e-mail, and the Internet — as soon as possible to stay competitive on the global stage.

"The whole world is our market," said Kibria. "We must be ready for the 21st century." Bangladeshi companies must increase the speed of the economy, he said, and improve communications so deals which took three weeks by regular mail, would happen almost instantly via e-mail. Mahbubur Rahman, president of the International Chamber of Commerce, Bangladesh, agreed. He said electronic commerce will transform business, especially as the Internet grows at about 10 per cent a month. The government should pass legislation to ensure these electronic transactions are secure to encourage companies to do business in cyberspace, he said. Singapore has already introduced a new authority - Net Trust - to ensure hackers can't tamper with Internet business transactions. The authority issues "digital fingerprints" so that companies know the people they are dealing with are legitimate.

But while the Internet is revolutionizing how companies think about business transactions. Bangladesh's communications network is a barrier. Once on-line, data moves at a snails pace as thousands of kilometers of copper wire strain to handle the load.

The average data transmission rate through copper wire averages 9.4 kilobytes per second and peaks at 10 kbs. Fibre optic lines, almost standard in the West but not available in Bangladesh, transmit data at between one and ten gigabytes per second. And the next generations is already here — ISDN lines transmit data even faster. but their high cost — roughly US$ 1,000 a month in the US excluding installation - puts them out of reach of all but the most serious surfers. "Our people are only suffering because of transmission." says an official from an Internet provider, who requested anonymity.

He says people are becoming more interested in the Internet and its advantages everyday, but with only 40 telephone lines there isn't enough room to handle all the clients. He says the company has requested 100 more lines from the Telephone and Telegraph Board, but hasn' received a response, yet.

And fibre optics? "If the government thinks the Internet is a viable thing for our country and the economy, then they will go for it," he says.

mote both economic development and "fundamental political values.

A ministerial group mandated to look at the situation in countries which violate such values will submit its recommendations to the summit.

One of the countries is Nigeria, which was suspended from the Commonwealth in 1995 following the execution of the human rights activist and writer Ken Saro-Wiwa and eight supporters, on what were seen internationally as trumped up murder charges.

Anyaoku said the ministerial group will finalise its recommendations next month. He said the team had an extensive dialogue with Nigerian authorities and been monitoring its progress on the "democratisation front. Anyaoku is in Singapore on the first leg of a nine-day visit that will also take him to Brunei and Malaysia as part of preparations for the Commonwealth summit from October 24

Trade, investment to top Downsizing: The catchword in Indian industry

by V Nathan writes from Mumbai

Downsizing is becoming a by the government. catchword in Indian industry. Automation and duty guts. which make import of raw materials and components cheap, have led several companies, including multinationals, to offer Voluntary Retirement Schemes (VRS) to its staff.

Slack demand for processed and manufactured goods, shifting of factories from cities, mergers and takeovers have also contributed to downsizing. The VRS is not confined to factory workers. In the latest instances, it was offered to even top executives. Trade union sources said employment opportunities are shrinking despite massive industrialisation and inflow of foreign capital. The work culture, too, has changed in the last few years. The recent industrial slowdown and the demand recession have prompted more managements to resort to the VRS. The job cuts are not restricted to the private sector. The Mumbai-based Central Railway, a major zonal network of the Federal railways, last month announced that it would not regularise the services of trainees. The trainees were simply asked to leave. Rail unions are planning to oppose the move. They had another shock when the Railways announced that it would impose a 2.5 per cent job cut a year for the next four years. "Staff reduction is a must as half of the Railways' earnings is spent on salary", said Railway Board Chairman M. Ravindra. Workers point out that the cut is totally against the United Front government's promise, that more jobs would be created by government undertakings. Ever since the textile mill strike of 1982, the city's economic profile has changed. In July, Siemens India, the Indian subsidiary of the German electrical and electronics multinational Siemens AG, announced that it would terminate the services of at least 1,400 members of its staff by offering them the VRS.

"We plan to cut at least 20 per cent jobs out of the 7,100strong workforce. The offer is open to staff members who have put in at least ten years of service and have reached the age of 40 years", said Mr Anil Nadkarni, the company's director of personnel.

union sources reveal that one of the key reasons for downsizing is the decision to source components from abroad, as the steep cut in import duties has made it cheaper to buy parts from China or South Korea. The company's unsuccessful foray into the telecom sector has also contributed to the job

Management and trade

situation, union sources said. The decision to set up new units in far flung areas -- away from raw material sources and ready markets -- has also contributed to downsizing. Siemens is offering compensation ranging from 30 to 70 per cent of the employee's last drawn salary, depending on the years of service left, multiplied by the number of months left till retirement. However, there is a cap of Rs 580,000 per employee. Another multinational pharmaceutical giant, Boots Îndia, last year offered a flat compensation (about Rs one million per employee) under the VRS. The company sold its facilities in the upmarket Sion area and shifted its operations out of Mumbai city. The Swiss pharma major Ciba-Geigy. The company shifted its entire operations to Goa.

According to industry sources, the VRS scheme is now spreading from cities to towns. Recently, two well known companies, Textool and Lakshmi Machine Works (LMW) in Coimbatore, Tamil Nadu. came out with voluntary retirement schemes. While Textool offered the VRS only for its managerial staff, LMW wanted to cut down the number of workers, who have become redundant following automation. "The general trend is that company managements, in the grab of restructuring operations, simply sack workers, who are in no way involved either in decision-making or marketing strategy" a union leader said.

Pharmaceutical multinationals are more aggressive in "manpower auditing", a soft term coined to describe voluntary retirement. At Boehringer Manheim, headed by takeover tycoon Ajay Piramal, over 100 workers accepted the VRS. The company, which is all set to merge with Nicholas Piramal explained that there would be excess staff following the merger and hence it has to resort to "rationalisation of manpower". Boehringer's offer was quite attractive. The company offered its employees 75 fered grade-wise pension benefits. The largest multinational pharmaceutical company in the country, Glaxo India, has also offered the VRS to 300 employ-months' salary or Rs 550,000. Last month, as many as 82 employees of Hoechst Marion Roussel accepted the VRS. Each employee was offered Rs 500,000. The company also of-

Asked why the VRS incidence is high in the pharma sector, a top official of Glaxo said the change in import duty structure was playing havoc with the manufacture of bulk drugs. "The import duty for bulk drugs has come down to 32 per cent from 40 per cent and this has made imports cheaper. For a cheaper price you get high quality bulk drugs from which formulations are made. This has led to large excess capacities and has resulted in VRS.

Companies are adopting different methods to deal with excess labour. These include the VRS, reallocation of work, relocation of factories and plain retrenchment. Worried about their jobs, middle and top-level executives are forced to hunt for jobs even while they are comfortably employed. This has created social and family tension at home. "While ordinary workers manage to cope better by taking up sundry jobs, highflying executives find it difficult to adjust to ground realities" an employment consultant said. Trade unions have largely failed in preventing the VRS. The case of Philips India is a striking example. When the Dutch multinational offered the VRS some time back, the company's largest and recognised union opposed it tooth and nail. But later, a firebrand union leader meekly accepted the VRS, terming it the best possible offer from the company This prompted several other employees to accept the VRS making the company's task

According to the Mumbai Labour Commissioner's office, a host of other companies have expressed their intention to introduce the VRS. "Since the offer is voluntary, there is no question of our office interfering in this matter," an officer said. Slain labour leader Dr Datta Samant had opposed the VRS and used to warn workers not to fall into this "one time payment" trap. According to him, most workers spend the VRS money within months and end up in the streets.
