Number of children with HIV to reach 1m by 1997 globally

The number of children living with HIV, the virus which causes AIDS, will reach one million by the end of 1997 in the world, reports BSS.

An estimated 400,000 children under the age of 15 became infected with HIV bringing the total number of children living with the virus at the end of the last year to 830,000, a report titled 'children with HIV-a crisis matus' said yesterday.

The report prepared by UNAIDS in connection with the World AIDS campaign this year also said that at least 350,000 children were under the age of 15 among the total one and a half million people who died of AIDS in 1996.

AIDS is not the biggest killer of children since diarrhoeal diseases alone killed more than two million children in 1996, the report said adding that the impact of AIDS was concentrated in a smaller number of poor countries but other childhood diseases was affecting nearly all developing countries.

The report quoting the prediction of United States Bureau of Census said that the disease would wipe out the improvements in infant and child mortality achieved during the last ten years in the sub-Saharan Africa.

If the spread of HIV is not contained by the year 2010, AIDS may increase infant mortality by as much as 75 per cent and under-five mortality by more than 100 per cent in the worst affected regions, the report said.

According to the UNAIDS estimates, about 90 per cent children under the age of 15 years being infected with HIV acquire the virus from their HIV-positive mothers, usually during pregnancy, delivery or breastfeeding.

"While not all children born to HIV-positive mothers become infected with the virus, the risk that the child will become infected is much greater in poor countries and in poorer parts of rich countries," the estimates said.

Most studies suggest that the probability of HIV transmission from mother to child known as 'vertical transmission' is between 25 per cent and 48 per cent in a developing country and between 13 per cent and 32 per cent in industrialised countries like Europe and North America.

The report described the childhood AIDS as a more aggressive disease which kills much faster in the developing countries than in industrialised countries of the west.

In Europe, the report said, 80 per cent of the HIV-infected children survive at least until their third birthday and more than 20 per cent reach the age of ten. In Zambia, however, one study suggests that nearly half of the HIV-infected children are dead by the age of two. Another study from Uganda said 66 per cent of HIV-infected children were dead by the age of three.

Poverty is the main reason that children die more quickly of AIDS in developing countries where crowding promotes the spread of tuberculosis and other respiratory diseases, malnutrition weakens immune system and lack of clean water encourages spread of water-borne diseases like diarrhoea," the report said.

Most studies suggest that the probability of HIV transmission from mother to child known as 'vertical transmission' is between 25 per cent and
