Publish names of corrupt bureaucrats, bankers' India must speed up

By Rafiq Hasan

The owners of sick industries are demanding publication of names of government officials and bankers who collided with willful loan defaulters and created a lot of assets for themselves.

According to them, the government and bank officials who were involved in approving projects and disbursing loans in irregular manner have always remained out of reach.

"The government should publish the names of those bureaucrats and bankers involved with various financial corrup-

The Parishad members will gather at Jatiya Press Club premises tomorrow Monday when the demand will be formally raised.

The Parishad will also demand full implementation of the recommendations made by a government review committee on sick industries. Though the committee submitted its reca ommendations about four months back, the government is yet to take any decision in this regard.

President and Vice-president of Federation of Bangladesh Chamber of Commerce and Industries (FBCCI) Yussuf Abdullah Harun and Kazi Shafiqul Islam will be the chief guest and special guest respectively at the meeting. Abdul Awal Mintoo, president of Bangladesh Association of Banks, will also address the rally. Alauddin said the list included both willful defaulters and those who became victims of circumstances, but that those responsible for making hundreds of enterprises 'sick' by pursuing wrong policies re-mained unidentified. He said the publication of the list of loan defaulters did not serve any socio-economic objectives, either in terms of loan recovery or rehabilitation of hundreds of sick industries.

"It has portrayed an ugly face of the country's investment scenario and, as a result. shaken the confidence of foreign counterparts of Bangladeshi businessmen." Alauddin said.

On the other hand, he alleged, the bureaucrats have shelved the review committee report on sick industries which frew a line between the willful defaulters and those who became victims of unforeseen conditions.

Living standard improves in developing states: WB report

People in developing countries are healthier, better fed and more educated than ever before. But this progress is uneven, according to a World Bank report, reports UNB. Some regions are making huge strides in improving the quality of life for their peoples, said the World Development Indicators 1998, the Bank's second annual compilation of key development factors and fig-

Others still show high infant mortality, poor nutrition, illiteracy and too many people living in poverty, it said. Infant mortality rates in Sub-Saharan Africa are well above those found in East Asia 25 years ago. And in South Asia, gender disparities in education mean that more boys attend primary school than girls, said the report made available here Friday.

Taking a detailed economic analysis of 150 countries with populations over one million, the Bank's new report provides a yardstick to measure progress towards six development goals set by the international community. These are:

* halving the numbers of people living in extreme poverty by 2015. * achieving universal primary education in all countries

by 2015. reducing infant and child mortality by two-thirds, and maternal deaths by threequarters by 2015.

SINGAPORE, Apr 18: Singapore and Malaysia vowed to step up cooperation today amid a regional economic crisis after formally opening a new bridge linking the two countries, says no later than 2015 and reversing current global and national loss of environment resources by 2015.

The report is one contribution to the Bank's efforts to help countries fight the scourges of poverty, illiteracy, disease, hunger and environmental degradation, said James D Wolfenshon, the World Bank Group President.

He said regular and systematic report on progress towards the six targets would focus attention on the task ahead. The report hints that success in reaching the new social and environmental goals is possible if the developing countries pursue the right policies. It says, "Their governments will need to stimulate more economic growth, redistribute income and wealth more evenly and improve social conditions for their people. The World Bank feels that donor countries and international development agencies must support those developing countries which show determi-the new goals. "The international agencies must take the lead in helping developing countries boost their ability to monitor their progress in reducing infant and maternal deaths or ensuring better access to primary schools for young girls," it adds.

Achieving a new development blueprint for the 21st century

Joseph E Stiglitz, the World Bank Chief Economist and Senior vice-president, and John Williamson, the Bank's Chief Economist for South Asia, attempt to show the way figure is 65 years - a big imtreme poverty by 2015; extend-Although South Asia's enrollprovement. In India, the im-ing primary school education to all children by 2015; eliminating gender disparities in primary and secondary school education that penalise young girls by 2005; both reducing infant and child mortality rates by two-thirds and reducing mortality rates for mothers by three fourths by 2015; reversing destructive environmental practices by 2015. These goals are ambitious.

For example, given the expected increase in world population, the achievement of the first objective will require that nearly a billion extra people be lifted out of poverty by 2015, of which 310 million are in India. Similarly, six million more infants will need to be saved at birth each year in developing countries, 1 million of which are in The World Development In-

Past experience shows that meeting the social goals of reduced mortality, increased gender equality, and extending universal education beyond the primary stage will be more difficult. Progress here depends both on continuing economic advance and on actively targeting the most needy, a process that can sometimes run into entrenched cultural barriers.

countries throughout the world have been pursuing more effective development strategies in recent years. Hyperinflation has disappeared as countries have increasingly realised the importance of maintaining macroeconomic stability. Many countries, including the two largest countries in the world, China and India, have cut their average tariff barriers by more than half during this decade, creating substantial benefits for themselves and the rest of the world. India has largely abolished the "license raj" that used to throttle the growth of the private sector. Successful governments have increasingly focused on their core mission, and surrendered former activities like steel production to the private sector. At the same time, they have recognised that the state plays a vital complementary role for markets, in creating the right institutions and infrastructure, including human skills, necessary for markets to thrive.

Promoting environmentally sustainable development is another priority for government action. Left to themselves, markets will produce excessive pollution and environmental damage. Although East Asia's governments have been active in many areas of national life, the region focused too narrowly on rapid and shared growth, while leaving worries about the environment for the future. The results are apparent: from the fires raging over Indonesia last year to the highly congested cities to increasing water pollution. Poor countries should not wait until they get richer to worry about the "luxury" of a cleaner environment. It is usually vastly cheaper to avoid environmental damage today than to fix the problems tomorrow. In some cases, like the destruction of tropical rainforests, the damage is irreversible. Never before has there been a greater consensus — among developing countries and the donor community — on a set of goals of development. An examination of the experience of the last decades shows that these goals are feasible. And never before has there been as much agreement about the set of policies that is necessary to promote rapid and high-quality development: ensuring fiscal discipline and macroeconomic stability, increasing openness, promoting competitive markets, investing in human beings, and getting the government to do well those things that it alone is capable of doing. Continuing the trend toward these better policies will make all the difference to economic progress, and thereby improve the lives of billions of people throughout the world.
