Indonesian currency plunges JAKARTA, June 17: Indone-

sia's fragile currency plunged more than nine per cent on Wednesday, Jeopardizing efforts by the International Monetary Fund to haul the Southeast Asian Nation's shattered economy out of a year long crisis, reports AP.

The drop came as a big blow to the government of President BJ Habibie, which has pushed an agenda of democratic reform since the ouster last month of the authoritarian leader Suharto.

A drastic weakening of the currency could also worsen rising inflation and mass unemployment, problems which helped spark riots and protests leading to Suharto's downfall after 32 years in power. Some shopkeepers in Jakarta, the Indonesian capital, shuttered their stores, fearing that the fall of the rupiah could spur more price increases and ensuring street violence.

The Indonesian currency closed in Jakarta trading at 16,700 rupiah against the US dollar, down from 15,150 rupiah a day earlier. Dealers said local banks were rushing to snap up dollars to pay off debt arrears. They predicted more demand for dollars to finance Indonesian imports of basic commodities, including medicine.

"With such a thin market and one-way trading, the only direction for the dollar is upward," said Pardi Kendy, chief of the treasury department of Bank Buana Indonesia, a private bank.
