Is English A Shortcut to International Recognition?

by Poornima Appukuttan

 ITH coveted international wards and prizes coming its way. Indian writing in English has suddenly shot into global prominence raising a question whether writing in English is a quicker route to global recognition and media attention?

Indeed yes, says Shishir Kumar Das, who writes in both Bengali and English. "Writing in English always gets instant popularity for the simple reason that it has emerged as the lingua franca, the global language," says Das.

Then why the translated works of Spanish poet Pablo Neruda and Gabriel Garcia Marquez, who writes in French, are so popular the world over?

"There is a hierarchy even in languages. While English is the most widely spoken, German, French and Spanish also enjoy international status. And in this linguistic hierarchy translations from Spanish stands a greater chance of being read than a work, for instance, in Hungarian.

By the same token, Indian translations are not picked up by the buyer, says Das as this hierarchy exists within the country as well and a Hindi or Bengali translation gains popularity much faster than a minority language like Tulu.

But Namita Gokhale, who writes in English herself, attributes it to how well the language fares in translation.

"Spanish lends itself to translation very beautifully whereas the same flexibility is not seen in Punjabi or Tamil. Morever, Spanish writers scope of experience is so wide that the works carry a universality of appeal.

Indian writings are very much steeped in the particular cultural and regional context which the international reader finds it difficult to relate to or empathise with, says Gokhale.

"French or Spanish works are popular because they have a pan-European culture that the Western reader understands," she says. But author Urvashi Butalia of publishers Kali for women does not agree with the argument that predominant regional element is responsible for limited popularity.

While in the international scenario Indian language works are being sidelined, the national media, which routinely carries excerpts and interviews of writers in English, seem to be following suit.

Geeta Hariharan, English fiction writer, blames the media and the attitude of the upper middle class for this frenzy for works in English. "This is a highly complicated issue. To understand it we have to understand the power equation which lie outside the literary arena.

In this age of neo-colonialism, English has become the global language of power. "And if you are recognised outside, the people and the press eulogise you. This difference will exist as long as we continue to see literature in such crude dichotomies," says Hariharan.

The quality of translation in India leaves a lot to be desired, says Assamese writer Indira Goswami, which is also a major reason for these works don't find many takers. The translation of some of the Russian works are carried out so well that the originality of the works remains intact, she says.

Das agrees with this view. Transla tion in Europe has been evolved over the last 100 years whereas in India we are yet to take the translation mechanism as an integral part of the whole literary exercise.

But according to Goswami, the publishers have the ways and means at their disposal to convert a badly translated work into a fine piece. "But they do not seem to want to take the trouble."

Butalia argues that this is a very recent phenomenon. Earlier publishers did not want to invest money in translation as they were not sure if it would find a market.

"The Indian publishing scenario is different from the West as until 10 years ago, the demand was limited to books of educational or instructional value. So who would spend money on translation when there was not enough market for even original English works, she says.

But the scene is definitely changing. With markets opening up, publishers are willing to devote money and energy towards bringing Indian language works into limelight, adds Butalia.

Gokhale also agrees that things are changing for the better Katha and Penguin have done commendable work to promote Indian works.

Making of A Nightmare—I

By A Z M Haider

TENIZENS of dream world, poets remain closeted in the ivory tower of their imagination and rarely descend upon this evanescent world to face its stark realities. It is true they dwell in the world of dream which sustains them and keeps them going. But it is furthest from truth to say that poets remain unconcerned with realities of life. As Shelley said "I fall on the thorns of life and I bleed". Life Shelley, a poet, whether he hails from Bangladesh or Botswana, UK or USA, Iran or Japan, cannot evade the thorns of life. He, on the contrary, faces them with all their pangs and afflictions and bleeds silently. He suffers with the suffering humanity and shares their trials and tribulations. A true poet is a "Type of the wise who soar but never roam True to the kindred points of heaven and home."

Fazal Shahabuddin is one of those bards who remains lost in a trance and luxuriates with his imagination in the world of his dream. Although he is eternally committed captive of his dream, he is not oblivious of his abode on earth. The dream to which he is committed is the dream of a brave, new world shorn of ugliness, meanness, injustices and exploitations. His dream is therefore, sacred. His dream is sublime.

Thus Fazal's dream, which revolve round this planet, the universe and the whole cosmic system, only reflects his deep and abiding love for the life we live on earth. The life system is not the monopoly of mankind. It permeates all objects of nature starting from mankind to the smallest of insects and tiniests of atoms and

Day after day I am heading towards a bad dream

I am heading at a break-neck speed

A terribly bad dream

A dreadfully bad dream of destruction, extinction, death and an annihilation I am speeding towards an unthinkable nightmare

I am now locked up in a death cell

I am now awaiting unaware the hour of all-devouring death.

By incurring expenditure of billions and billions of dollars rubles, pounds, frances and rupees

By amassing our talent, intellect sensibilities and knowledge

We are building gradually, bit by bit destruction as large as an epic and a painful nightmare

The nightmare which is another name of nuclear warheads

The nightmare which is another name of extermination. The nightmare which is another name of cold wave

Fierce heat of a huge mass of light

Life-destroying radio active energy Life that I am heading towards a bad dream

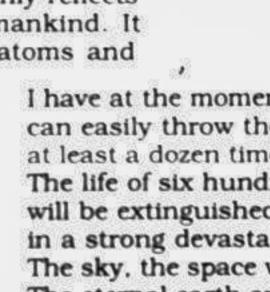

at a terrible speed and I know

The weaving of my nightmare is almost complete

I know that in this strong penetrating cold northern wind Where there is an unending wintry night

of infirmity and death

I know the quantum of nuclearized nightmare

I have at the moment, when exploded can easily throw the world to a total extinction at least a dozen times. The life of six hundred crore human-beings will be extinguished in split of a moment in a strong devastating whiff The sky, the space will be steeped in a smokescreen extended all over. The eternal earth and the ageless universe The darkness described in Books of religion which is another name of the Day of Resurrection and continuing death will descend upon the stifling moan The sun rays of billion of years The ancient moon light of several hundred thousand years The whole sky will be enveloped by a curtain of deep darkness impenetrable, boundless, inseparable Illimitable curtain of gloom will come down upon our life rains as red as blood as piercing as sharp blades of arrows will alight on all our sources of existence It would be a rain of ice-cold water It would be a rain of biting snow It would be a ceaseless hailstorm notices stirring of life in flowers and foliage, in the sky and the space, nay in all creations under the sun. His soul rebels against any attempt at annihilating this life process or at deforming, distorting and destroying molecules. He traces out pulsation of life in roar of oceans and murmur of rivers and brooklets, in the snowy crest of mountains and in splendours of butterflies chasing from flower to flower in a dale on solitary foothills. Fazal

the face of our mother earth or at defiling its atmosphere. He noted with deep anguish that man, who is crown of creation, has taken the initiative to produce lethal weapons like nuclear bombs to cause wholesale destruction of this planet. He decried this inhumanity of man which has brought countless thousand mourn. In his agonized outcry Fazal asks what right mankind has to produce such dangerous weapons of mass destruction and jeopardize life of his co-partners in this planet.

Twelve years ago when South Asia was by and large a nuclear-free Zone, Fazal at that point of time wrote a long poem expressing his apprehension of the possibility of nuclear disaster overtaking this region inhabited by a population of over one billion languishing in limitless poverty and privation, death and disease, squalor and hunger. The two major countries of this region, India and Pakistan, are now found to be engaged in frittering away their scarce resources in prohibitively expansive nuclear blasts, to the utter shock, surprise and fear of other countries of this area. The myopic leadership of the two South Asian neighbours, instead of tendering food, education and medicare to their hapless multitudes, are now busy stockpiling deadly nuclear warheads.

Gifted with a prophetic vision, Fazal Shahabuddin foresaw the crisis engulfing the whole of South Asia. Having anticipated the impending danger, he wrote a long poem entitled "Making of a nightmare."

In this poem he gave a vivid account of magnitude of the disaster. He also gave vent to his righteous indignation and protest against mad race for acquisition and amassing of nuclear warheads. This is perhaps the first poem in the whole range of Bengali literature in which the dangers of nuclear arms have been expressed in such vivid details and with such mathematical precision that its readers cannot but be stirred to their roots. It may not be out of place to point out here that no other poet in the contemporary Bengali literature has so far made nuclear holocaust looming large on human race a theme of his poem.

> The pulsation of life will come to a dead stop With the descend of glacial waves All of a sudden roar of rivers will come to a standstill The under-currents of all rivers will be clogged The mountain ranges will be blown to bits The water levels will roar and rise to Himalayan heights It will continue to erupt and scatter all over Against life and all human aspirations Against man's eternal desire to revolve interminably like wild storm

Like flow of liquid fire The sea wind will start running in blind fury Trees will be razed to the ground Forests will disappear in that painful destructive fury The animals, the birds, the insects and the moths will fall flat in a moment on the ground with a cry and their bodies will be drenched in blood The earth will be steeped in an ecological condition shorn of light and darkness, flowers foliage and insects and in an endless cold wave of extermination in a nightmare Lifelessness will be pronounced windlessness like death will pervade everything.

Agony and Ecstasy

by Raana Haider

N the eve of the final encounter between the hots and the hosts, the feeling within us was one of pure ecstasy for the winner since we wanted both Brazil and France to win the last Coupe Mondiale of the twentieth century. Hand in hand and heart to heart were also feelings of sheer agony for the vanquished - since we wanted neither to lose. But ce n'est pas la vie (but such is not life) and France trailblazed into a stunning 3-0 victory over Brazil.

The French team was slowly picking up momentum as it crossed hurdle after hurdle. And so too did the French public. For even the official programme of the World Cup notes that, "France is a paradox. A land of footballers rather than of football, the country has some of the best training facilities in Europe, and French players are exported with great success... and yet, the public is despairingly quiet when it comes to supporting and encouraging the national team. Critical and virulent towards their national stars, the French are generally only chauvinistic when a television screen is between them and the field... Will the public provide the warmth and support necessary to encourage their national players ...?

What was lukewarm and undemonstrative French public was slowly and surely wooed by the momentum of success and when France qualified for the semi-final against Italy — it exploded. The outpour of emotion; shrieks and shouts, joy and disbelief, claxon of horns and furling of the tricolores (the red, white and blue French flag) on Les Champs des Elysees on the night of the semi-final qualification was a sight France had never seen. The celebrated first avenue of France became an impasse of humanity and tooting vehicles. The Mexican Wave by the public seated on the Champs des Elysees and then rising and raising their arms in unison was a sight to behold. Had France already smelt victory? Within twenty-five minutes of the final whistle on the Stade de France, thousands and then millions poured into the Champs des Elysees and every large expanse and narrow street of Paris and every other city of France. The friendly festivity of frenzy overtook France by storm and surprise. The Arc de Triomphe was crowned in light — a crown of victory. On it were flashed "Champions de la Monde' (Champions of the World) and 'France 3 - Brazil O'. On the facade of the monumental heart of Paris was screened the picture of Zinedine Zidane, the twenty-six year old Algerian-born scorer of two of the three French goals who plays for the top Italian club Juventus Turin.

En route to Roissy airport at 3 pm on the day of the final, I saw the crowds already heading for the Stade de France for the match scheduled for 9 pm. The fanfare of festivities following victory were still to be heard at 3:30 am the next morning. The following morning saw a downpour of rainfall - perhaps Nature's way of dampening the euphoria which nevertheless exploded once again as the victorious French team received the adulation of the nation and the ultimate honour - a triumphal march down the Champs des Elysees on the 13th of July. Even Nature turned sympathetic. For the afternoon march was held under a brilliant blue Parisien sky. "My God! this is like it was at the Liberation," (of France from German occupation in 1945), said to World War Two veterans in tears. From her balcony on the fourth floor of a building on the Champs des Elysees, Marie-Jeanne Larriot, 83 years old, swore that she has never seen the Champs this way. And she has lived at this address since 1939.

In an earlier article on the opening ceremony of the World Cup 1998, (Extraterrestrial Extravaganza), I had written that the famed Champs des Elysees had traditionally always received the victorious and the beloved of France. This may have been the reason why Pablo, the giant representing the Americas (including Brazil, the favourites and four-time Cup winners) was selected to start off from the Arc de Triomphe and trot down the Champs des Elysees? So too had the body of Napoleon been taken down the avenue of honours en route to be buried at Les Invalides, so too did pass the French troops following the liberation of France at the end of World War Two, and it is where Le Tour de France, the traditionally favourite sporting event of France (the cycle race) ends. Les Champs des Elysees, of course, is the venue for the 14th July Bastile day parade commemorating the French Revolution of 1789.

The wholesale destruction will continue

This time, it was not the favourites, Brazil who took honour, but for the first time ever — France — carried the 4.98 kgs. La Coupe Mondiale 98 trophy of gold and malachite down the avenue of victory. It was also a French man, Jules Rimet who first conceived the World Cup in 1928. However, it took France another seventy years to possess it. There has been much analysis and discussion on television, in the newspapers and magazines of the social sigmificance of this sporting event. The almost unanimous voice is one of cohesion and fraternity that this victory has created within the nation. Much has been made of the multi-ethnic composition of the French team, with winners whose roots go back to Algeria, Antilles, New Caledonia and Africa. Michel Wieviorka, sociologist and author spoke of the "real image" the French team represented of France. He also remarked that the multi-racial makeup of the team "is the triumph of republican integration." Fate could not have dealt France a greater gift in timing than this victorious sporting event on the eve of 14 July. Its repercussions have been felt far and wide within the country's social fabric. Isn't the demolishing of the Bastille prison, the symbol of royalty and privileges by the marginalized masses in the 1789 French Revolution the raison d'etre for the 14th July celebration of the event? In commemorating today that past, France appears to have renewed its commitment to 'Liberte. Egalite et Fraternite.'

And on the 14th of July celebrating. Bastille day, President Jacques Chirac of France royally received the equipe Francais, les blues (the French team, the blues) at the presidential palace, Elysees Palais for a garden party. We saw Zinedine Zidane, the darling of the French public enter the Elysees amongst cries and shrieks. To the cries of "Et un! Et deux! Et trois zero!" (And one! And two! And three zero!) and the singing of 'Champions of the World' (in English within the bastion of the French presidency!) and in the sumptuous splendour of the Elysees Palais; the French team, their wives and children were introduced by a visibly thrilled President Chirac flanked by Prime Minister Lionel Jospin and members of the French cabinet to a rapturous crowd of invitees. For the next elections, President Chirac has the vote of French women in his pocket. He made a marvellous gesture by particularly thanking the wives of the victorious team. Aime Jacquet, the coach of les blues was bestowed the highest French civilian honour. He was given the Legion of Honour medal.

As the host-country winner of La Coupe Mondiale 98, the last major sporting event of the twentieth century, France in its first-time victory with a score of 3-0 has cut a milestone in French history. Was it not Charles de Gualle who said, "France was created either for complete success or exemplary misfortunes. France cannot be France without grandeur." All or nothing. And France went out for all.
