Kibria on microfinance institutions Time has come for regulating their lending activities

Finance Minister Shah AMS Kibria has said the microfinance institutions (MFIs) in the country should not behave like the 'intermediate money-lending class' and the organisations should try to uphold their dignity and international reputation, reports BSS.

The concept of micro-finance, which was innovated in our country, has created enthusiasm in different countries across the world including affluent nations like the United States," he said, adding "issues like alleviation of poverty or empowerment of women are basically global in nature."

Kibria was addressing the inaugural session of a workshop titled 'Emerging Issues in Microfinance' jointly hosted by Bangladesh Institute of Development Studies (BIDS) and Palli Karma Sahayak Foundation (PKSF) at BIDS conference hall at Agargaon in city yesterday.

Director General of BIDS economist Abu A Abdullah, Managing Director of PKSF Salehuddin Ahmed and BIDS researcher Sajjad Zohir also addressed the opening session.

Kibria said the MFIs or the NGOs should immediately frame their own financial regulatory system, as the current interest rate is intolerable to the poor people.

The Finance Minister said that the government had no intention to stifle the innovative approaches and ingenuity of the non-government organisations serving as MFIs by introducing regulatory arrangements.

"Time has come for setting up regulatory system to streamline the microfinance enterprises of the MFIs or the NGOs," he opined.

Kibria added: "It becomes an exploitation when an MFI is borrowing at the rate of 3 to 5 per cent interest from PKSF or other funding agencies and lending the same money at the rate of 20 to 25 per cent to the poor group members."

The finance minister said that the microfinance institutes were meant for curbing the unholly money-lending practices in the countryside, which unfortunately had historic its footings in the rural economy of Bangladesh.

He said great leader Sher-e-Bangla A K Fazlul Haque launched political campaigns against such financial practice to ensure welfare of the poor farming families.

Referring to impact of micro-credit, the Minister said growth of the economy is integrally related with the performance of microfinancial endeavours and 'the impact of micro-credit would be much lower where the economy is stagnant.'

RAJSHAHI, May 6: Commerce and Industries Minister Tofail Ahmed yesterday asked the sugar mill workers to raise production or face liquidation as the exchequer could not bear huge losses every year, reports UNB.

"All mills have to be made profitable by cutting overhead expenditure and shedding off excessive manpower for the sake of their existence in this era of free market economy," the minister told the workers.

Addressing a workers' rally at the Rajshahi Sugar Mills ground, Tofail urged them to devote greater attention for making the mills profitable.

"The present government has created an environment for industrialisation by removing the anomalies,"

Citing examples of high recovery rate by sugar mills in Pakistan and India, Tofail Ahmed asked the workers to find ways and means for raising the recovery rate in their mills to bring down production cost.

BA hostess strips for bet

LONDON, May 6: A British Airways air hostess set the pulses of Italian baggage handlers racing when she stripped down to her underwear and ran around a Boeing 737 at Genoa airport, the press reported here, says AFP.

The attractive 23-year-old brunette, waiting to recrew an incoming plane, had bet a colleague that she would perform a half-strip if the BA flight arrived early — which it did.

She amazed passengers and baggage-handlers by walking down the aircraft steps dressed only in shoes, knickers, a loose-fitting safety-waistcoat and the captain's cap.

The BA air hostess then sprinted around the length of the jet "smiling and wiggling" according to onlookers.

The captain on the Sunday flight to Genoa's Christopher Columbus airport reportedly knew of the bet and made every effort to fly in ahead of schedule, taking advantage of favourable wind conditions and unobstructed air traffic space.

An airport official told The Daily Telegraph: "I did not see it. But there were a lot of baggage handlers and customs people here who did, and they are still talking about it."

"She was really attractive and it was apparently quite something. I wish I had seen it. She had a yellow tabard, which is the safety vest all personnel must wear on the runway to be visible to other aircraft. As far as we are concerned, she did not break any rules."

Will Mexico open up its economic data vault?

MEXICO CITY, May 5: In the last phase of haggling for $5.2 billion in IMF cash, Mexico is keeping Wall Street guessing over whether it will allow the IMF to publish for the first time its fine-focus assessment of its economy, says Reuters.

Analysts say Mexico has made strides in increasing access to information since its shattering peso crash in 1994, before which it published figures on central bank reserves, for example, only once every six months.

Now Mexico publishes its reserve data weekly and has a stated commitment to increasing the availability of hitherto guarded information, improving what economists term the country's transparency.

Economists say Mexico's release of the IMF's so-called Article IV consultation, a detailed, annual examination of a country's economy by a dedicated IMF team, would be a test of its real commitment to openness.

If Mexico would release it, it would undoubtedly demonstrate its commitment to transparency," said Lacey Gallagher, chief Latin American analyst at rating agency Standard & Poor's.

"The majority of the major Latin American countries make it available to people who are interested," said another Wall Street economist, adding that in Latin America alone Peru, Argentina, Uruguay and Colombia all did so, if only to selected financial analysts.

Arturo Porzecanski, ING Barings chief economist for the Americas, said expectations had been raised by recent praise for Mexico from the Institute of International Finance (IIF) and from the IMF at last week's meetings in Washington.

"In Washington, Mexico was held up as the model of transparency," he said. "My expectation is that Mexico will be at the forefront in keeping us informed of its intentions, progress and eventually its programme with the IMF."

At those meetings, Finance Minister Jose Angel Gurría told Reuters Mexico was negotiating a $5.2 billion 18-month standby loan with the IMF, with the deal likely to be wound up in June.

Sources at the IMF say there is a growing trend for nations to publish the details of agreements — the so-called letters of intent plus the accompanying economic policy memoranda containing details of recent economic developments and future programmes.

More and more countries are also publishing the IMF Board's review of mission findings — the Article IV consultation — in the form of a Public Information Notice. Mexico never has.

"On all important countries in the emerging market field there is mounting pressure on all sides to make these documents available," one IMF source said.

Argentina, Brazil, Thailand, Indonesia and Korea, which have all struck recent IMF deals, have all published their related economic policy memoranda on the Internet in recent months, raising expectations Mexico will follow suit.

Peer pressure added to a two-year push from the IMF to boost transparency both within the Fund and among its member nations is also turning the screws on foot-draggers.
