Technique for growing teeth to order

A technique for growing teeth to order by gene manipulation is being developed by an expert in the United Kingdom, who predicts that such a procedure will become common practice within the next 20 years, reports UNB.

Prof Paul Sharpe, who specialises in craniofacial development at Guy's Hospital, London, claims he has already found the gene that controls tooth growth although he admits that there are hundreds of other genes which also play a part in dental formation, according to a London Press Service (LPS) report.

Prof Sharpe and his research team are tracking genetic pathways which enable teeth to be formed and hope to create a gel containing the material required to form a new tooth wherever it is placed, ideally inside a cavity of one that is missing.

Mice are being used in the experiments as it is easy to observe and modify their tooth growth.

Barx-1 is the gene controlling teeth growing in mice although Prof Sharpe successfully modified this incisor-growing gene to produce molars. This was done by blocking an inhibitor known as BMP4 which causes the incisors to grow.

In the genetic modification experiments, teeth have been grown outside the kidney of an adult mouse and then removed for examination.

Once the tooth has been implanted in the mouse it grows within three weeks. The kidney was selected because it has a ready blood supply and is one of the optimum sites for such experiments. In the past, researchers have used eye sockets to grow teeth.

Prof Sharpe is also studying how genetics repair damaged teeth and replaces lost ones.

The three-year research project is being funded by the UK's National Medical Research Council but Prof Sharpe is looking for further financial backing from the dental industry.

Teeth can already be grown in a laboratory but their growth in the mouth and how they interact with the body is much more complicated. The way they are connected to the nervous system and positioned in the mouth remains a mystery which Prof Sharpe also hopes to solve, the LPS report said.
