Perhaps no season is as celebrated in North India as the monsoon rains. Its recurrent and haunting imagery is a refrain that echoes through literature, art and music, a season of joy tinged with sorrow, of renewal and melancholy. The parched land lies under the sun, intense with expectations of the first showers. Clouds mass on the horizon, getting denser and darker, pierced by snakes of lightning as thunder rumbles like a celestial drumbeat. Then, at last, the rains-an occasion for rejoicing as the earth slakes its thirst and becomes green again.

Muhammad Anisur Rahman
Publisher: Pathak Shamabesh
Price: Tk 395/-

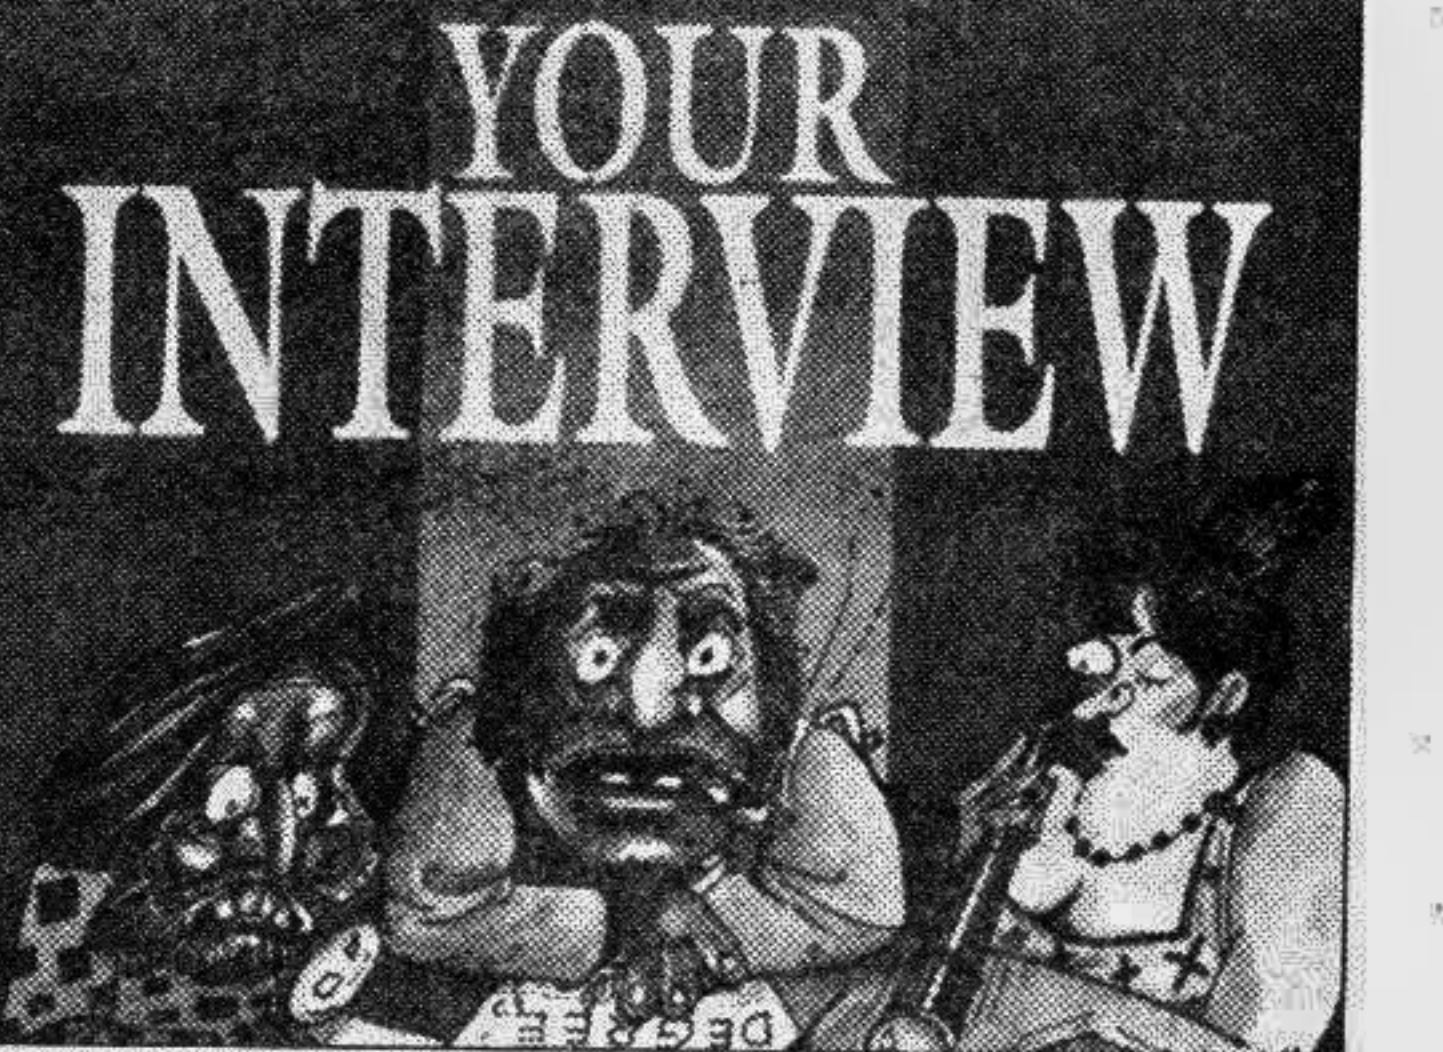

This book has emerged from the author's attempts to translate songs of Rabindranath Tagore for non-Bengali listeners and members of singing groups that the author has directed, and for participants in international seminars and workshops where songs have been exchanged as a cultural dialogue between nationalities in-between intellectual exchanges. Thereafter the author discusses the place of song in Tagore's philosophy; as a pathway and communication as the poet saw it between the human and the Divine; Tagore's own conception of aesthetic singing, major thought trends in Tagore's songs expressing as they do the poet's own awareness of life; and melody in Tagore's mastery works as a composer.
