Plants dying due to lack of maintenance in Gaibandha

From Our Correspondent

GAIBANDHA, Aug 14: Hundreds of plants and trees are dying every year in the district due to lack of proper maintenance.

On the occasion of tree plantation drive programme huge numbers of saplings are planted along roadside and embankments every rainy season by different government departments, non-governmental organisations and other voluntary organisations. But these saplings die within very short times because no one takes care of these newly planted saplings.

Meanwhile, many of the planted saplings along the roads and embankments are attacked with unknown disease, local people said. Not only saplings but also grown up trees of 10 to 15 years old also die of the unknown disease, they added.

According to witnesses, the disease attacks the roots of trees first. And within a few days the affected roots become rotten and eventually the trees die after two to three months.

When contacted local forest department officials said they could not identify the disease.

A reliable source said some unscrupulous people intentionally kill roadside trees by using poisonous chemical. Later they cut down the trees.

With a view to preserving ecological balance the government has been encouraging people to make tree plantation drive a success.

Thana parishad, union parishad, Roads and Highways Department, Forest Department, Agriculture Department and NGOs have been engaged in planting saplings since long. Every year these organisations plant huge numbers of saplings under tree plantation drive. But soon after the plantation no one looks after the saplings. Saplings, generally, fall victim to cattle.

Our Brahmanbaria Correspondent says: Villagers in all seven thanas of the district are facing acute shortages of bamboo, one of the main items of rural house building materials.

Rural people usually build their houses or huts with locally available materials. For this they need bamboo, rope, hemp and mud. On the other hand, the sheets of corrugated iron and wood are needed for semi-concrete tin-shed houses. Most of the villagers live in bamboo-straw made cottages.

Many farmers cut down their bamboo and hemp clustures indiscriminately in the previous years to bring more lands under crop cultivation, creating acute scarcity of the rural houses building materials in district. One large size bamboo is being sold between taka 150 and 175 in the local markets.

Villagers said due to shortage of shan, leaves of hemp plants, they are now using the straw of paddy plants for making the sheds of houses, creating the severe crisis of fodder. As cattle heads are suffering from fodder crisis, crop cultivation on lands is also being hampered.

Meanwhile, the bamboo cultivation in the district has declined due to growers' lack of proper knowledge of scientific farming. Besides, most of the growers think that the bamboo cultivation is not profitable one.

Once clusters of bamboo and hemp plants were available in the eastern part of the district.

One Muhammad Ali of Paharpur village said over the years farmers have turned their lands of bamboo clusters into crop lands. Bamboo farming was not much profitable, he added.

The authorities concerned should take immediate steps to impart training to growers and help increase bamboo production, opined elderly people in the district.
