Joi Injects Multicultural Spirit in Music

British band Joi performs at Osmani Auditorium

By Ziaul Karim

IN the novel Shesher Kabita (The Concluding Poem), Rabindranath Tagore brilliantly expressed his view about the emerging new trend in literature as: 'When the fasli mango season is over, I won't say go and bring some lesser quality mangoes, but would prefer aata fruit that is available with the coming of the new season.' Speaking figuratively, Tagore suggested that he was not going to cry for styles and trends that were worn out in literature and would rather welcome fresh trends even if they were not comparable to the high standard of classical literature. Many people present at the Osmani on March 4 felt somewhat like that.

The band Joi, brain child of British-Bangladeshi Shamsheer brothers, started off as a community project in the 80's in London's East End, the highest concentration of the Bangladeshi community in UK. As the second generation of British Asians the Shamsheer brothers have seen the ugly face of racism, were raised in a multi-racial society like London, inherited the music that their parents carried with them and inhaled the pop, rock, reggae and techno from the society as they grew. They are no longer the Asians their parents were, nor even the Britons they wanted to be. This new breed of people as they are termed British-Bangladeshi or British-Indian wanted a new identity and found the expression in fusion or in blending of the Asian and the Western cultures. Joi's chutnified music is the symbolic expression of its multicultural spirit and literally it is a multicultural troupe. Farook Shamsheer in keyboard is of Bangladeshi origin, Lahcen Lahbib in percussion from Morocco, Sonia Mehta the vocalist is from Punjab, Susmita Banerjee the dancer is from Calcutta, and the guitarist Aziz Ibrahim is from Pakistan. The guitarist Aziz has played for internationally famous band Simply rocco, Sonia Mehta the vocalist is from Punjab, Susmita Banerjee the dancer is from Calcutta, and the guitarist Aziz Ibrahim is from Pakistan. The guitarist Aziz has played for internationally famous band Simply

Red and Susmita has training in Bharat Natyam and in marshal art. They have successfully incorporated their diversified cultural inheritance to their music. The result is stunning. Their first major vinyl outing

Desert Storm earned them Single Of The Week status in the NME and their effort was greeted as 'one of the most inventive dance records ever made.'

They approach music as an intimate element for dance for which they work with sound system and in fact Joi began as a sound system. Quite naturally dance floors are their ultimate hunting ground and the single Fingers set the dance floors around UK alight.

Now what is interesting about their music? For most of the music lovers of the city, Joi may not be as thrilling as they have been in UK dance floors mainly because the dance (a mix of Bharat Natyam and marshal art) they have incorporated in their presentation may not be something refreshing for the audience nor the infusion of sargam or classical style tarana may appear as something exotic as they do in the western eyes. And if we look at Joi's triumphant tours throughout the past year one thing will be clear that they have been to European cities and a successful tour in USA. So basically Dhaka is for Joi the first Asian exposure.

Joi's musical talent and experimentation got paid off with the coveted BBC Asia Music Award in 1999 going their way. Post-colonial critics might raise their eyebrow why the award dubbed as Asian Music and not international music. Aren't they ready to recognize Joi's contribution to the international mainstream?

In the formation of the Western modernist aesthetics encounter with African cultures in the so-called 'scramble for Africa' period of the 1880s and 1890s was crucial. In the formation of the future western post-post-modernism these fusion would play a crucial role. At present they are going through a transition, searching for an authentic multicultural identity: an identity of the truly global citizen.

In Celebration of Language

International Language Fair at the National Museum brings together interesting items for all

By Muneera Parbeen

THE on going International Language Fair at the National Museum premises has attracted a large number of visitors in the past two weeks. The fair being held by the National Museum in collaboration with the Chittagong University Museum was formerly opened on February 19 last, on the eve of the first International Mother Language Day.

A large number of attractions await the visitors to the fair. Apart from items of local interest the fair has put on display a variety of items to with languages all over the world. Most of these materials were collected through the cooperation of the foreign embassies in the country.

There are currency notes, flags, newspapers, charts of alphabets of different languages and the like artifacts from different countries of the world on display. Provisions have also been set up to listen to music in different languages as well as the national anthems of different countries. There are also written statistics on display proclaiming the usage of different languages around the world. Bangla finds itself in the seventh place on this list, based on statistics collected in 1997, which means it's the language used by seventh most people on earth. Chinese is the language used by most number of people in the world.

There are old documents on display, original papers containing the handwritings of poets Kazi Nazrul Islam, Rabindranath Tagore, Michael Madhusudan Dutt and other historic personalities as Ishwarachandra Bidhyasagar and Begum Rokeya. Also on display are manuscripts and documents related to sale of articles in the old period using Revenue stamps with values as one anna and the like. A canon used in the period of famous Bengal ruler Isha Kha which is inscribed with Bengali alphabets. Different types of currency used in Bengal, both the old metal coins to the different types of paper currency is also on show.

Items more in relation to our Language movement include photographs depicting different events of the early forties to the late fifties, when the actual Movement occurred. There is on display a blood stained shirt and coat belonging to language martyr Shaheed Shafiqur Rahman. A short history of the events that took place is also on display for all to see.

The National Museum building has been decorated on the occasion of International Mother Language Day. Paintings and murals depicting the struggle for attaining the right to speak and use our own language decorate the outer walls of the building. Other decorations and banners at the entrance to the museum also give a festive look to the entire premises.

The fair, that was put together in a very short period, according to the museum authorities, will come across as a very interesting compilation of artifacts for people of any age. Children however will find the fair most interesting, for in it they come upon information about a good fraction of the world and the languages used therein.

The fair, scheduled to end on February 29 was extended on popular demand upto March 8. It is open from 9.00 am to 5.00 pm every day except for Thursdays and only in the afternoons on Fridays.
