

ECB calls for help from govts to put brake on prices

Record low currency bugs bank

BRUSSELS, Oct. 27: European Central Bank leaders, faced with new record lows in the euro, said yesterday they were doing their job to foster a healthy economy, but euro-zone governments also had to play their part, says Reuters.

On the day the euro sank near 82.30 US cents, ECB President Wim Duisenberg pointedly declined to comment on "very temporary" short-term economic factors, but called euro-zone growth prospects positive and the best for 10 years.

"Europe can rely on its central bank, which is fully dedicated to its goal of price stability," Duisenberg said in a speech in Berlin. But he stressed other policy makers, and not just the ECB, should play their part in maintaining price stability.

He said euro-zone governments should continue structural reforms and fiscal consolidation, while unions and employers should not let high oil prices deflect them from the path of wage moderation.

"Any attempt to react to the latest oil price increase with wage rises would be harmful to the currently favourable growth prospects, because monetary policy would have to react to the upward pressure on prices," he warned.

ECB Chief Economist Otmar Issing, in a speech at Cambridge in England, struck similar themes, saying the bank would go on living up to its task of keeping prices stable, but that "other policy makers in Europe have also to play their part."

Issing said the fall in the value of the euro presented the ECB with a big psychological problem as it was the only message featured in the media, although no central bank could control both internal and external price stability.

In separate comments to appear in the Frankfurt Allgemeine Zeitung newspaper on Friday, Issing said last month's central bank intervention had been a success because it had made betting on the continued slide of the euro a lot more risky.

Duisenberg said that the public in the euro zone looked to the introduction of euro notes and coins due at the beginning of 2002 as the real start of the single currency, rather than its launch in financial markets in January 1999.

There was no mention of possible central bank intervention by Duisenberg, who ran into a storm of criticism last week when comments he made in an interview aggravated euro weakness by appearing to cast doubt on prospects of such concerted action.

But ECB council member Eugenio Domingo Solans said the ECB would use whatever means necessary to achieve its goal of price stability and had not ruled out intervening to support the euro.

"The ECB will do all it can to achieve its objective of price stability, without excluding the possibility of (forex) intervention," Domingo told reporters in Madrid.

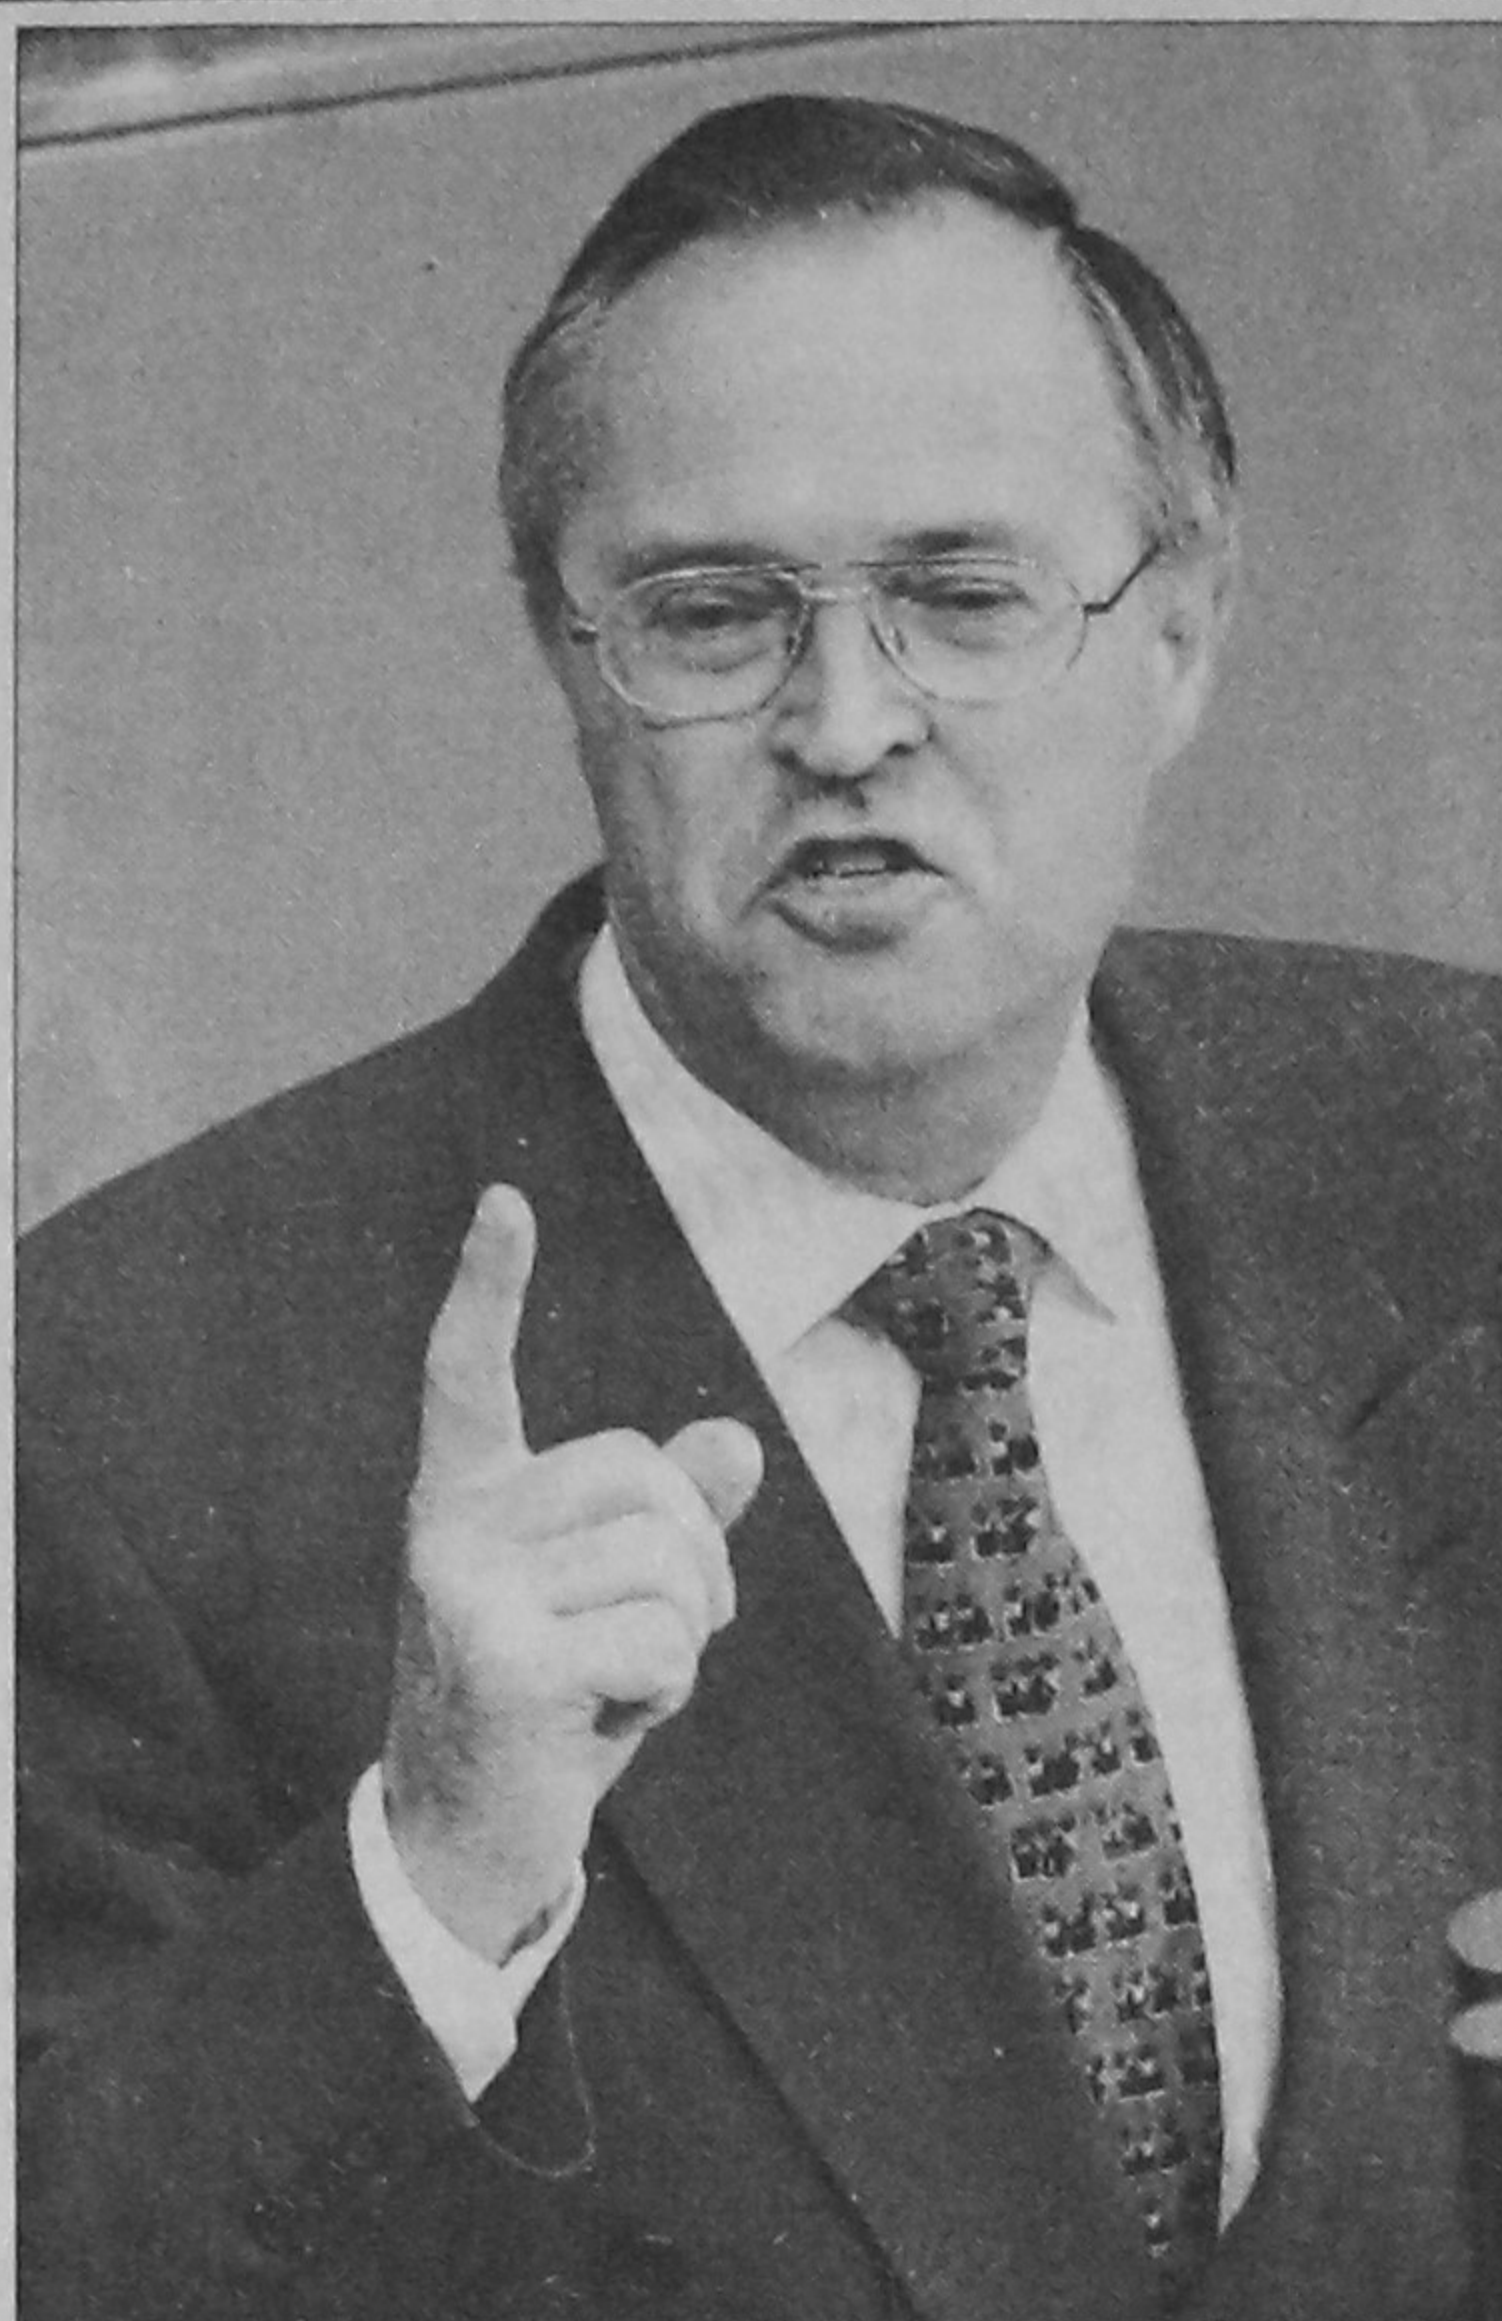

He said a good economic performance in Europe would eventually be reflected in the euro's value, so that eventually it might even become too strong. "There will come a time when the problem will be the opposite (of the current weakness)," he said.

Other European politicians and officials joined in a barrage of comments to talk up the euro as traders punished the currency after a G20 conference of industrialised and emerging market economies in Montreal ignored its plight. At 1700 GMT the euro was meandering around 82.80 cents.

The imminence of next month's US presidential elections is widely perceived as making the US Federal Reserve, unlikely to favour a repeat of the joint central bank intervention seen on September 22 when the euro was not as weak as it is now.

German Finance Minister Hans Eichel makes a point during his speech at the German parliament, the Bundestag, in Berlin, yesterday. The euro will rise against the dollar in future, Eichel insisted.

Malaysia ends exit tax for foreign investment

KUALA LUMPUR, Oct. 27: Malaysia further eased its controversial capital controls Friday by abolishing an exit levy imposed during the Asian financial crisis in 1998 to prevent foreign investors from pulling out their money, reports AP.

Finance Minister Daim Zaiduddin, who announced the measure while presenting Malaysia's 2001 budget in Parliament, said that the tax could now be removed because the capital market environment has improved.

In September 1998, Malaysia locked in foreign investments for a 12-month period to stem fund outflows, which the government deemed was making the crisis worse.

In February 1999, it replaced that measure with an exit levy system which was later refined in a series of moves, enabling investors to pull out their funds but a prohibitive cost.

Prior to Friday, the government required a flat 10 per cent exit levy on all portfolio investment profit, regardless of the investment duration.

Reuters says Malaysia today unveiled a budget for 2001 aimed at boosting foreign investment and infrastructure spending to keep it among the fastest growing economies in the world.

Finance Minister Daim Zaiduddin proposed to allow foreign companies to take equity in the national carrier Malaysian Airline System, the car maker Proton, and said foreign participation in airports will also be considered.

Daim also called for the abolition of a 10 per cent levy on the repatriation of profits held after one year by foreign portfolio investors.

The levy was introduced as part of measures to partially ease capital controls Malaysia imposed in 1998 after a sudden exodus of foreign money in the wake of the Asian financial crisis, crippled the country's markets.

The Finance Minister said the government will continue to assess the effectiveness of its fixed exchange rate regime, which currently pegs the ringgit at 3.8 per US dollar.

The budget allocated 4.73 billion ringgit ($1.24 billion) for infrastructure spending.

Daim said the government would take stakes in foreign firms to develop Malaysian interests in new technology and also proposed to set up a 500 million ringgit venture capital fund.

But the budget disappointed expectations for a cut in corporate tax and hopes of a bigger boost in people's disposable income than the finance minister proposed.

Next year's budget deficit is forecast to amount to 4.9 per cent of Gross National Product, Daim told parliament.

Hackers break into Microsoft network!

NEW YORK, Oct. 27: Software giant Microsoft Corp. said on Thursday that hackers had broken into the company's computer system, in what a spokesman called a "deplorable act of industrial espionage," says Reuters.

Microsoft spokesman Rick Miller declined to comment on what specific areas of the computer network were breached, what the specific goals of the hackers were, or the possible motives.

The company had reported the break-in to the US Federal Bureau of Investigation and was working with authorities to protect its intellectual property, he told Reuters.

Citing sources close to the situation, the Wall Street Journal reported that the hackers were believed to have stolen the blueprints to the latest versions of its flagship operating system Windows and its Office software package.

Miller declined to comment on what, if anything, had been stolen. The FBI was not immediately available to comment.

"We recently became aware of attacks to our corporate network," Miller said.

"Microsoft is moving aggressively to isolate the problem and to secure our corporate network. We are confident that the integrity of our source code remains secure," he added. The company became aware of the attacks "in the last couple of days." Asked if the attacks had stopped, Miller said, "We believe so."

Microsoft's security employees discovered the break-in after they detected passwords being remotely sent to an e-mail account in St. Petersburg, Russia, the Wall Street Journal reported. The company interpreted electronic logs as showing that those internal passwords were used to transfer source code outside the Microsoft campus, it said.

The newspaper quoted a person familiar with the case as saying that the hackers used a programme called a "Trojan".

Named after the Greek myth of the Trojan Horse, the hacker sends a seemingly innocuous file to an unsuspecting person.

Hidden within the coding of the file is an insidious programme designed to infiltrate the computer of the user who opened the file.

Once the file is opened, a damaging programme may be installed on the computer and may even start sending copies of itself to other computers. Once the software is installed, it becomes easier for hackers to gain access to the information on that computer.

Experts for adopting nat'l refugee law

By Staff Correspondent

Experts at a discussion yesterday underscored the need for a national refugee law for the protection of refugees.

They were addressing a consultation meeting on "Need for a National Refugee Law" organised by the Refugee and Migratory Movement Research Unit (RMMRU) at CIRDAP auditorium in the city.

Suranjit Sengupta, Parliamentary Affairs Adviser to the Prime Minister, in his speech said Bangladesh as a nation, which enjoyed the benefit and generosity of the international refugee regime during the War of Liberation, should respect the rights of refugees.

"It is not a question of whether or not Bangladesh should have a refugee law, but now the question is what law we should have?" the legislator asked. He pointed out that the refugee problem has to be seen from a humanitarian point of view.

Dr Shamsul Bari, a former senior official of United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR), in his keynote paper refuted the common arguments against adopting a national refugee law or according to the 1951 Convention relating to the status of refugees.

He pointed out that without being a party to the Convention, Bangladesh has already hosted a large number of refugees.

Barrister A K H Morshed, a former Foreign Secretary, however, accepted the need for a refugee law, but stressed that it has to be developed under a regional understanding.

He said it is imperative that apart from India, Myanmar should also adhere humanitarian principles, otherwise we may have to pay the price by according to the 1951 Convention or adopting national refugee legislation alone.

Dr Shahdeen Malik, M M Sunnah, Legal Officer of UNHCR, Dhaka office, Barrister Shamsuddin Chowdhury Manik, Deputy Attorney General, Haider Ali, legal counsel of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Dr Borhan Uddin Khan, Yasmin Ahmed of Odhakar and Khurshid Irtan Ahmed of ASK also spoke on the occasion.

Dr CR Abrar, Coordinator of RMMRU, moderated the session that was represented by 32 NGOs, human rights organisations and research bodies.

A new book titled Towards National Refugee Laws in South Asia was also launched on the occasion.

His quikhwani will be held at his 6/2 Shyamoli residence on Monday after Asr prayers.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina expressed deep shock at the death of veteran journalist Gazi Rafiqul Islam, joint-editor of Dainik Probat.
