Dhaka, Thursday, November 9, 2000

Fascinating US Election

TT has been breathtakingly close going right down to the wire, a little too nail-biting even for the close call prophesies. As if to keep to the pattern of sharply fluctuating fortunes between Gore and Bush at the final counting stages, announcement of conclusive results climactically hinged on a recount of votes in Florida. The margin of difference between the two contenders to presidency narrowing down to less than one per cent of the total number of votes in the state that crucial recount was necessitated in Florida before drawing a curtain on the final count.

The US presidential race, 2000 has been unique on quite a few counts: first, it has proved to be a cliff-hanger along the entirety of the electoral process - encompassing desperate campaigning dashes to the finishing line and the neck-to-neck final counting almost bracing up to scrape the half a million absentee ballots in the US military manning overseas posts and among the American expatriates. It turned out to be fascinatingly dramatic, and in effect, tense and nervy, too, for the rest of the world watching the spectacular waning and waxing of fortunes between Bush and Gore right down to the last-minute posting of tallies. There the people of the US and the rest of the world have had a nerve-racking experience, only in slightly varying degrees. That is the charm of a democracy in action.

By far the most unique feature of the electoral outcome is the US voters' recognition of peace and unprecedented economic prosperity during the last eight years under Clinton matched by a craving for change. The winner has to pay heed to this underlying message of the popular verdict.

Our heartiest congratulations to the winner in a closely-fought contest and we wish him success through his tenure into the new millennium. We hope that in matters of strengthening US Bangladesh ties he will not flinch from carrying forward the positive tenor that the outgoing US President Bill Clinton had set for the expansion of our bilateral ties.

New Telecom Bill

NONOPOLISED by the state-run Bangladesh IVI Telegraph and Telephone Board (BTTB), the telecommunications sector in the country has been the most inaccessible domain to private entrepreneurs so far. But, certain developments in recent times suggest that the days of state monopoly are numbered. The government has already decided to strike a deal with WorldTel for installation and maintenance of 300,000 new land-based telephone connections. Now, news reports say that the telecom ministry is processing a bill for the introduction of National Telecommunications Act. 2000 envisaging an empowered and independent Telecommunication Regulatory Commission. The bill, when approved and enacted into a law, would effectively end the government's tight control over the telecommunications sector. In the proposed scenario, the BTTB will just be a public sector entity operating side by side with private operators like cellular phone companies. The level playing field, as the new law visualises, would entail healthy competition and thereby ensure better services for the subscribers who, until now, have been held hostage to BTTB's whims.

Over the years, tight state control has retarded advancement of the country's telecom sector. On the other hand, lack of accountability and transparency has turned the BTTB into a den for corruption, mismanagement and malpractices. The installation charges and call tariff in the country are among the highest in the world while services rank amongst the worst. Moreover, willingness to pay the charges doesn't essentially mean access to basic telephony. The waiting period between submission of a demand notice and installation of connection, according to a recent World Bank survey, could be as long as 13 years. In the face of growing displeasure amongst subscribers and increasing demand amongst people to have access to telecommunication network, the government has finally decided to leave behind old ways. Indeed, it deserves a pat on the back.

In this era of greater interconnectivity, increased private sector participation is imperative for a rapid enhancement of the telecommunications infrastructure. It is hardly possible for any government to solely finance adaptation to the changing needs of time. Thankfully, the government has realised this sooner than later.

What about Compensation for Jarina?

DIMAN authorities have suspended six of their Demployees from work in the wake of an incident of luggage pilferage at the ZIA on Saturday last. In the stealing of the arriving passenger Jarina Khatun's savings from her suitcase pauperising her public conscience has been stirred with an attendant wave of sympathy for her. But there has not been any development in terms of compensating Jarina for her loss which we demanded immediately following publication of the news about her plight. While welcoming Biman's departmental action we would like to ask: when is her loss going to be indemnified? Safe delivery of air passengers' luggage should be a normal affair, and there has to be an agency, or authority, responsible solely for this purpose. Why do people have to complain of burglary and other hassles which they experience while arriving in Bangladesh through ZIA? Since operations at the ZIA have not yet assumed the giant proportion of those in many other international airports, the basic services here ought to be of a certain quality - easily. The authorities must live up to the expectations of the passengers. The Jarina Khatun incident has brought into focus the abject lack of supervision within the airport compound. And the message would be lost if Jarina's plight does not help improve the process of luggage-handling at the very least.

Women's Agenda in Bangladesh: A Political Discourse? ANGLADESH presently seem to be at a critical juncture of its history as far as the country's women's political empowerment agenda is concerned. The issue at stake is women's effective representation in the parliament through a constitutional amendment. However, I hesitate to use the phrase "critical juncture." First, because Bangladesh seems to be perpetually in a state of crisis. How do we survive? Of course, by leaping from one crisis to another. This is an accepted fact of life in Bangladesh. Second, do the leadership of the country consider the present period critically important calling for some dynamic actions that would enhance women's political empowerment? Do they visualize that there is an urgent need for a constitutional amendment so that we can scrap the present system of maintaining thirty kana mamas or thirty sets of ornament and go for a meaningful arrangement to add women's voice in the running of country's

We would be in some kind of affairs? I don't think so.

deluge if we believe that country's leadership is convinced about the importance of the said agenda and are exasperated and at their wits trying to find ways and means to ensure women's effective voice at country's highest law-making body. That is not being the case it cannot be a crisis situation. Obviously very little can be done if the leadership does not think that immediate measures are needed to rectify the past wrongs done to the women population of the country no matter how much advocacy is done at the national, divisional, district and even at grassroots level, and whatever might be the intensity of the activities by the women activists. Truth is that it would not simply be taken seriously. Right now it is only a lot of noise made over the required constitutional amendment and nothing more than that. Do sound too disheartened or disillusioned? There are compelling reasons if I do.

First, I feel that women's political empowerment agenda in Bangladesh has never been taken seriously since the inception of the country. From the very beginning, there have been two evident trends that ran counter to each other. Historically, women, though not in large number, have had significant participation in the various mass movements distinct heritage and destiny. Liberation meant hopes for and women's rightful place in the running of the newly established state. However, the counterveiling trend--strong and entrenched masculine values embedded in the gendered political parties and patriarchal state apparatus created, defined and sustained by men, prevailed over the ideology on which the liberation war was fought. As a result no endeavours were made to make space and an enabling environment to make the politics women-friendly. As a matter of fact, women were effectively barred from taking part in what was meant to be only a male domain. The women's question was not simply raised in any meaningful way. Rather it was dealt with in a clear cut patriarchal and patronizing way as evidenced by the process women were accommodated in the highest decision making of country's political structure.

They were making recommendations for the sake of recommendations. They either need not worry or care about it because the political parties would take care of the rest. How can then one expect that the political parties, which would decide and shape the course of Bangladeshi women's future in the 21st century, would be willing to accommodate women's demands when the male-dominated society at large is least serious about it? Isn't it natural then to ask the question that has the women's political empowerment ever been in the political discourse of the country?

It is tragic that the question of women's political empowerment could be settled with a few bhavis or chachis (interesting that they had to be married signifying the strong male linkage) in the parliament through a constitutional values and patriarchy in the state amendment. No attempts were apparatus that impede their made to nurture the potentialities unfettered participation. Indeed of the nascent women leadership the women's organizations and who had emerged through the women activists have put up a mass movements, especially the tough fight against such proposimovement of 1969, and the liber- tions having created a little dent ation war of 1971, within the here and there at the societal party structures or in the elec- level. But by and large there have toral process. If history is any not been any serious debates as guide then it is hardly an to whether or not the influx of endeavour to discover that how women into politics would transvery differently the male student form politics or it alone can make leaders and female student lead- the government more responsive ers who fought side by side in to women's concerns and intercountry's historic movements ests. At the functional level the were treated by the leadership. later concept perhaps have made How unjust and how cruel the a few minds turned around but at process had been can be easily the conceptual level there is total discerned from the fact that vesterday's male student leaders, all along, have had the chance to be at the helms of country's including the liberation war of dent leaders created by the same 1971 that gave Bangladeshis a process have now mostly disappeared in the shadows excepting may be a few who turned themdemocracy, humanism, justice selves as NGO leaders (that also is and equity. And therein lay the a very recent fact). How very seeds of women's emancipation unfair it is that those who took part in changing the course of our history have now no say in influencing our national politics.

Second, the issue of women in politics has had very little intellectual inputs either by the women's organizations, the political elite or the civil society. Despite the recent hullabaloo that is being made over the question of women's reserved seats in the Parliament and plethora of workshops and seminars on women's issues the theorization of women's input into the political (Bystydzienski: 1995)," We have never considered that large-scale entry of women would not only broaden the parameters of governance but also can help mitigate the confrontational politics of our country in the context of women's special qualities in maintaining social relations and their negotia-. tion and compromise skill. Obviously then there is an urgent process has remained largely need for deeper appreciation of unaddressed. The customary these dimensions so that we (the pejorative have been that the constitution does not restrict women from taking part in the electoral process of the country without paying any heed to the deeply embedded masculine intellectual vacuum.

The faith that women can including the political leadership. transform politics has been questioned and researched in varying affairs whereas the female stu- forms in the developed nations.

country) can break free from the typical mould set by patriarchy. which propagates that women's particularistic morality, intellectual inefficacy, physical vulnerability, and high degree of emotionalism make them unsuitable to govern. It is time that we have a deeper look at women's political culture and internalize women's involvement in politics, especially at the grassroots level and community work. Without appreciatthere can never be an abiding political process indeed is beneficial and it can help bringing indeed be treated trivially. It is at this context I would like to vantaged group facing patriarmention how the issue is being addressed by the society at large

To the best of my knowledge tics in order to not only get rid of and my interactions with the the age old discriminations and members of the political and civil practices but also along the way

But not in Bangladesh. We have society. I find that the timely never analyzed how women's women's agenda is being dealt desire for broad social reforms, with in a very casual manner. their tradition of sacrifice within Apathy and highest degree of the families and their sense of insensitivity prevail when it duties and responsibilities can comes to the present women's help change the very nature of demand regarding representation politics (defined by men) of "fierce at the national legislature. It competitiveness, hierarchy, becomes extremely difficult to formality, ritualism, rigidity and push women's cause when the emphasis on self-interest political parties, civil society leaders assume that the entire environment and institutions are gender-neutral when in reality they are not and work in favour of men. This is an arena where the women's organizations face an uphill task. In this respect their task is stupendous i.e. the movement needs to convince not only democrats but also the left and the left leaning politicians and the civil society leaders about the significance of women's input into country's politics and highlight the correct modus vivendi for women's participation in it. Indeed it is gargantuan in the sense that while the democrats women's participation under a liberal democratic and genderneutral dispensation when the left leaning sections advocate women's participation in terms of class subjugation and class struggle. These thinking are reflected when the liberal democrats euphemistically profess women's equal rights as individuals ignoring impediments that the women face as women. The left, on the other hand, would not even address women's issue as separate agenda as they feel that the problems would be automatically ing women's input into politics resolved as soon as the class struggle is over. The left faith that their inclusion in the ideologues fail to perceive that women are the victims of both class and gender. What the about a change in country's women's movement needs to do is masculine dominated political to convince both liberals and the agenda. If there were no such socialist by theorizing faith then the matter would transformational feminism (Ibid: 1995) that women who as disadchy, fundamentalism and chauvinism require special arrangement to have their input in polibringing qualitative change in Bangladeshi politics.

I would argue that since there is a lack of deeper understanding about how the male-female power relations should be arranged the vital issue of women's representation is being treated in a piece meal manner and without any serious thoughts. The careless and negative statements of various politicians from both the major parties as well as the Prime Minister about women's effective representation in the parliament bear and depict how they have internalized the significance of this vital issue. Unfortunately, this is also evident among majority civil society leaders who are supposed to mediate between the state and the citizens (in this case the women). I discovered this casual treatment of women's effective representation in the national legislature while interacting with a number of civil society leaders in a recent workshop. First, the group had to be literally coerced to admit that special arrangement was needed for making women's parliamentary representation effective. Second, they simply could not grasp that large number of women parliamentarians could not only address women's concerns and interests but also could propagate equal rights for contribute in making the parliament more effective.

Eventually, when they agreed politics is gendered, the left and to make recommendation for enhanced number of women's directly elected reserved seats most of them started to play a number game as if it was a trivial matter, and to my horror one of them said "why increase it to sixty-four? Make it hundred or more. We know that the political parties would never agree to it." Implicit in this statement was the fact that they were making recommendations for the sake of recommendations. They either need not worry or eare about it because the political parties would take care of the rest. How can then one expect that the political parties, which would decide and shape the course of Bangladeshi women's future in the 21st century, would be willing to accommodate women's demands when the maledominated society at large is least serious about it? Isn't it natural then to ask the question that has the women's political empowerment ever been in the political discourse of the country? I leave the judgment to the readers.

Strange Finale to a Strange Election

LTIMATELY, Florida holds Ashfaque Swapan writes from Berkeley, California the key. Many die-hard Democrats are wistfully

Of course, political pundits had a field day. With the advent of 24-hour cable news channels, the species has proliferated, and every hour of the day and night pundits pontificate on what the electorate thinks and why. But most analysts hedged their bets when it came to predicting who will win. Bush was slightly ahead in most nationwide polls-- the margin varied in different polls but all were within the margin of error.

hoping it will turn the election around after everybody thought it was over. At about 12:45 a.m. pacific time, the day after the Nov. elections, which means 3:45 a.m. New York time, an unprecedented final twist added further sus- vidually, and it's a winner-takepense to a cliffhanger of a unprecedented presidential election absentee ballots remained to be a whopping 30-point lead.

throwing the television media into utter chaos once again. After most of the major televi- much as a single vote and latest sion media had declared Texas Governor George W. Bush the with a straight face) indicate he 43rd president of the United will win the state he gets the States, his Democratic rival Vice President Al Gore called the Republican candidate and retracted his earlier concession. because Florida was still too close to call. Florida election officials said that the latest count showed Gore trailing Bush by an agonizing 1,000 votes, and thousands of counted. Whatever may be the ultimate many of the larger states includresult, the news media has come out looking particularly bad. Twice in the evening the media had been caught wrong-footed: Earlier they had declared Florida to have gone to Gore based on exit polls, then they retracted when the actual vote count leaned towards Bush. Later in the day based on projections they gave Florida to Bush and declared Bush the winner of the elections. But then, the race tightened in the state and it's a toss-up again. For the uninitiated outside the United States, all this bears some explanation. A U.S. president is not elected ence between two candidates is by popular vote. Presidents in this country are elected by electoral college, an archaic, complicated system which few Americans comprehend fully. The long and short of it is that each state has a number of electoral votes allotted to it in proportion to its population, and the winning candidate needs 270 electoral votes out of a total 538.

National polls that gave a lead to Bush included his home state Texas, for instance, where he has ster in the U.S. now, to put it very, very mildly. The bizarre turn of events is a fitting finale though that is hardly the right word at this point to a strange, frenzied campaign.

On election eve, a whole slew of states remained toss-ups, and both campaigns went crazy trying to figure out the possible permutations and rescheduling lastmoment campaign stops to help their candidate add that extra fillip which will tilt the state in their candidate's favour.

As the countdown began for the final lap of the electoral race for the world's only remaining superpower or hyperpower, as the French slyly say the two main contestants scrambled for a mad rush to touch as many bases as Gore went on a grueling 30hour political swoop that took him to seven cities in the farflung states of Iowa, Missouri, Michigan and Florida before returning to Carthage, Tennessee, where he cast his vote.

Bush barnstormed through Tennessee, Wisconsin, Iowa and still get elected and now Bush Arkansas and returned to his seems to be the most likely candihome base in the Texas capital of Austin.

A strange paradox has haunted this presidential election: It is one of the most tightly contested presidential elections since 1960 when Democratic candidate John F. Kennedy beat Richard Nixon by a whisker, yet enthusiasm for the polls this time around is so low that about half the electorate is expected to sit at home for this one.

Of course, political pundits had a field day. With the advent of 24-hour cable news channels, the species has proliferated, and every hour of the day and night pundits pontificate on what the electorate thinks and why. But most analysts hedged their bets when it came to predicting who will win. Bush was slightly ahead in most nationwide polls the margin varied in different polls but all were within the margin of

This complicated electoral math has given rise to the bizarre possibility that the next president may lose the popular vote and date for that dubious distinction. It has happened previously in this country thrice, most recently in 1888. As pundits and pollsters spent sleepless nights, the electorate seemed far less enthusiastic. To be sure, the political pundits had a lot to say about that as well. One pundit decorously put it as a choice between "character" and "competence." If truth be told, reality is less pretty. It seems fair to say that a substantial part of the electorate probably finds the choice unappetizing it is a choice between the shallowness of Bush, who runs out of thoughts when required to speak for an extended period and ties himself in knots when explaining his own tax and social security programs, and Al Gore, who had three makeovers in three debates so that all that intelligence and grasp of detail seems focused on one issue Al Gore, who can't make up his mind who he is. Having said that, passing any comment on the tendencies of the U.S. electorate is an exercise fraught with peril, as pollsters and network media have discovered the hard way. It was not long ago that political pundits across the nation wrote a premature obituary of President Bill Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal, only to receive a smart rap on their knuckles by the electorate. Another reason the average voter is disillusioned maybe the degree to which the presidential political process has been tan over by handlers and political spinmasters. A candidate who runs for the presidency in this country has to cater to a diverse electorate. What, indeed, do an avid environmentalist in the sylvan state of Oregon, a bedroom communities that encircle many metropolitan areas like a donut, and a gun-loving conservative rural resident in the deep south have in common? Not much, and presidential candidates get around this problem by resorting to the most hallowed of political skills fudging the issues and promoting themselves with fuzzy advertisements of how nice, lovable individuals they are, and packaging themselves according to the ministrations of political consultants and pollsters.

Amid this tightly orchestrated campaign, consumer activist Ralph Nader has stirred up the pot, much to the chagrin of the two-party duopoly, whose minions have refused to let him participate in the presidential debates. Not since maverick Texas tycoon H. Ross Perot in 1992 has a third party candidate created so much consternation. This time around, the Republicans were delighted, because Nader's support hit Gore in Ore-

At the end of it all, all told, a staggering $3 billion was spent in this year's presidential, congressional and gubernatorial races. As the day of reckoning has come. it's not only the politicians who are nervous. Pollsters are eating humble pie.

In the previous election, political scientists used models to predict the outcome of the presidential election several months beforehand and one model came closer to the actual tally than the exit polls. This year, a few months back, several political scientists presented models all predicted a Gore victory, the difference was in degree. Bush was leading the polls by 20 per cent at that time.

In a strange juncture of a very strange election, it is the pollsters who have been beaten by the political scientists in the popular vote. And the nation is still waiting to find out who will win the single mother in an inner city, an electoral college and be the next affluent suburban voter in the president.

PM on ZIA

Sir, Our powerful prime minister talks tough all the time, with blistering attacks on all and the sundry, sparing none (even the judiciary), but why she is so soft on ZIA, namely the ZIA International Airport Dhaka, where the crooks and gangsters are running an open empire of fleecing and harassing the passengers inside and outside the airport? * There are several security agencies working there under government supervision and control, but they are messing up the operation clean-up, and there consider a good move to control is no sign of professional effi- the unruly rickshaw-pullers to ciency in a government which some extent. But these rickshaw takes pride in its performance. lanes are very narrow moreover it The introduction to Sonar creates parking problem. There-Bangla, on alighting at the air- fore, I would like to request the port, is a disgrace to national authorities concerned to make pride, and a black spot on the the lane littler wider so that at authorities who manage the least two rickshaws can ply freely have been recorded at ZIA? The another to park. SPA should be scrapped if it cannot be applied without fear Anvir Adil Khan and favour. If we cannot run an airport, how do we expect to run a country?

votes were really up in the air.

On the other hand, Gore won in ing California (54 votes), New York (33 votes) and most of the New England states, which gaves him a shot at winning the magic followed, Florida with its 25 votes

has become crucial for the ulti-

the next president has to win

Florida. With a difference of barely a few hundred votes between them another issue has kicked in this unheard-of presidential election. State law in less than half per cent of the votes cast that's over twenty thousand votes an automatic recount major polls had given Bush the edge, while it turns out that thanks to his massive lead in California, Gore seems well set to end up winning the popular vote.

It is not a good time to be a poll-

Meanwhile all pre-election

Florida requires that if the differ-

In the complicated math that Simply put, whoever becomes 270 electoral votes.

mate winner.

takes place.

AlifZabr Dhaka

Separate lane for rickshaw Sir, It is being observed that in many roads, separate lane for rickshaw is being constructed by placing concrete block which I airport. How many SPA cases and there are enough space for

41, Eskaton garden

Ramna Dhaka Retention of English

Sir, This is about language controversy that often erupts with such intensity that it clouds our rational thinking.

The stock arguments of persons who oppose the retention of the former official language need not be repeated, but these do not stand to reason in view of follow

English language has become a Lingua Franca and is most widely used all over the world asmeans of easy communication. Our neighbouring countries have not discarded it, rather, they have assimilated it in their own cul-

Since we have already an not to forget his culture and the advantage of knowing such a useful language and our students have to learn it in order to study, say, Engineering, Medicine, Law, etc how can we reverse the process? For example, can we discard thousands of cases reported in English language law journals which are absolutely necessary especially in our courts? Population explosion in a Ex-Member, National Board smaller territory is our main problem. About three million Bangladeshis now work and live abroad relieving pressure at home also by remittance of money. They may now constitute about two per cent of our present population. Without knowledge of English, they could not have achieved this. However, it is a pointer to easing the problem of educated unemployed by means of imparting knowledge of and training in English. A

Bangladeshi national is expected expatriates have successfully projected it abroad from time to same mistake made by Muslims of this subcontinent which had to be rectified by Sir Syed Ahmed about one hundred years ago.

SMSZaman of Revenue Advocate, Supreme Court

Political solution for Pakistan

Sir, Pakistan can never return to political stability unless and until the Punjabi-majority shadow over the nation is democ-ratised (Opinion, DS, Nov 2). The break up of Pakistan lead ing to the loss of East Pakistan and emergence of Bangladesh is also related to similar conditions prevailing since 1947 to 1971.

Now evidently the Punjabis are out to demolish the Bhutto influence in politics (now overloaded We should not commit the with the Afghan refugee crisis). But the other services, the armed forces, financial institutions, the private sector, agriculture are also monopolised by the Punjab. The inherent weaknesses of the other provinces is a sad reality; magnifying the huge disparity. The British canal system in the Punjab increased the Punjabi leverage. Earlier, even the One Unit concept did not work in the then West Pakistan. Huge hydro and gas projects have not yet created a situation towards a more balanced disparity.

Pakistan's solutions lie within, with the Punjabis; and with the big landlords (feudal zamindari system, which is extensive in Sindh alsol.

Dhaka