

Cold wave paralyses life in Nilphamari

People crowding winter garment shops in Magura

From Our Correspondent

NILPHAMARI, Jan 6: Unprecedented cold wave during last four days has almost halted normal life in this district town.

Severe cold wind coming from the Himalayas has made lives of the dwellers, specially the homeless people of this small town miserable. Severeness of the cold wave worsens after mid-day and turns extremely unbearable in the evening. Everyday, fog clouds the town until 8 to 9 am and vehicles ply in the streets with their headlights still on. Although the sun appears for a while around 10 am, but it soon disappears to the dismay of the dwellers. Last Monday morning drizzles made things even more worse.

Destitutes are trying to combat this bitter wave through heats generated from burning heaps of straws and old rubber tyres. On the other hand, second hand warm cloth sellers making best use of this situation, are earning handsomely by raising the prices two and even three times. Diseases like fever, cough, cold and dysentery have also alarmingly increased. The only government hospital is crowded with bronchitis and asthma patients. But the hospital is short of oxygen and do not have the "lobolizer machine."

As a result distress and sufferings of the patients know no bounds. The medicine pharmacies also making good use of this abnormal situation have doubled prices of life saving "salbutamol inhalers."

Severeness of cold wave in this small district town situated near the Himalayas is usually bitter than other areas of the country, which usually deteriorates in January and February. Observers feel that this cold wave will worsen further during next few weeks. Cultivation of winter crops, particularly potato is facing damage from this unnatural coldness.

Although some voluntary organisations have come forward with warm clothing for the destitutes, but this is extremely meagre compared to requirements. Authoritative sources believe unless the government and the rich section of the country come forward with arrangement for distribution of sufficient warm clothing for the homeless people in this area, possibility of loss of life from this bitter and severe cold wave may not be ignored.

Our Magura Correspondent adds: As cold wave sweeps across the country, including the district, people here are crowding winter garment shops.

Sellers display varieties of warm clothes in shops. Many vendors are also selling garments, including old ones, on footpaths and in public places.

A large number of makeshift shops have also sprung up in Sub-registry Office, Head Post Office, Magura Government College and local Police Station areas in the town.

But prices are comparatively high this year, local residents said. "People of low-income group are flocking shops which sell old warm garments", said Abu Bashir Akand, a resident in the district headquarters.

"Nowadays people of all classes buy from us. Our clothes are not below standard. We only do not have permanent shops", said Altaf Mia who owns a shop in front of Head Post Office.

Sales of clothes have marked sharp rise. Now daily sales range between 2,500 taka and 3,000 taka, said a shop owner in Sub-registry Office premises.

Most of the buyers are now showing interest to buy readymade winter clothes, according to the shopkeepers.

Garments from popular Bangabazaar in the capital are in great demand here, they added.
