IPR needed to protect bio-diverse resources

By Staff Correspondent

Experts at a workshop yesterday underscored the need for adoption of Intellectual Property Rights (IPR) to protect the resources of bio-diverse rich third world countries to have a better bargaining position with countries who intend to have access to their bio-diversity.

The process of commodification and trading of bio-resources started about three centuries ago when the Europeans came across the biodiversity rich nations and colonised these countries by exploiting the bio-resources," said Dr. Pushpangadan, Director of National Botanical Research Institute of India.

He blamed the colonial powers for exploiting raw materials and traditional knowledge of the 3rd world countries for production of value added product, which ultimately leads to a destructive extraction of the bio-resources. This also undermines the ecological security and stability of bio-diversity of the third world nations.

These processes have also undermined livelihood security of the traditional communities of the third world," he said.

He said IPR is a matter of national sovereignty and policy, because it establishes monopolies and monopolies are de facto, dangerous.

He said IPR is essentially a concept and practice developed by industrialised western countries during the last two centuries to allow monopolistic ownership or control over intangible products.

"IPR is defined as a property rights covering all other things which emanate from the exercise of human brain," Dr. Pushpangadan said.

Dr. Prabuddha Ganguli, an Intellectual Property and Information Security Consultant of India, Dr. Koli Date-Bali, Special Advisor of Commonwealth Secretariat, London, Dr. R. Saha, M. Fazlur Rahman, Secretary MOST also spoke on various aspects of IPR.
