K AUSAR has made about 18 films earlier, most of them being based on social topics. This includes 'Proitkuler' or 'Counter Image' which was based on Abanindranath Tagore's 'The Killing Field' or 'Boddho Bhome' which was based on the '71 killings in Khulna. He made films on environment and cultural subjects too such as on Bengali festivals and rituals such on Nishkenda Devta.

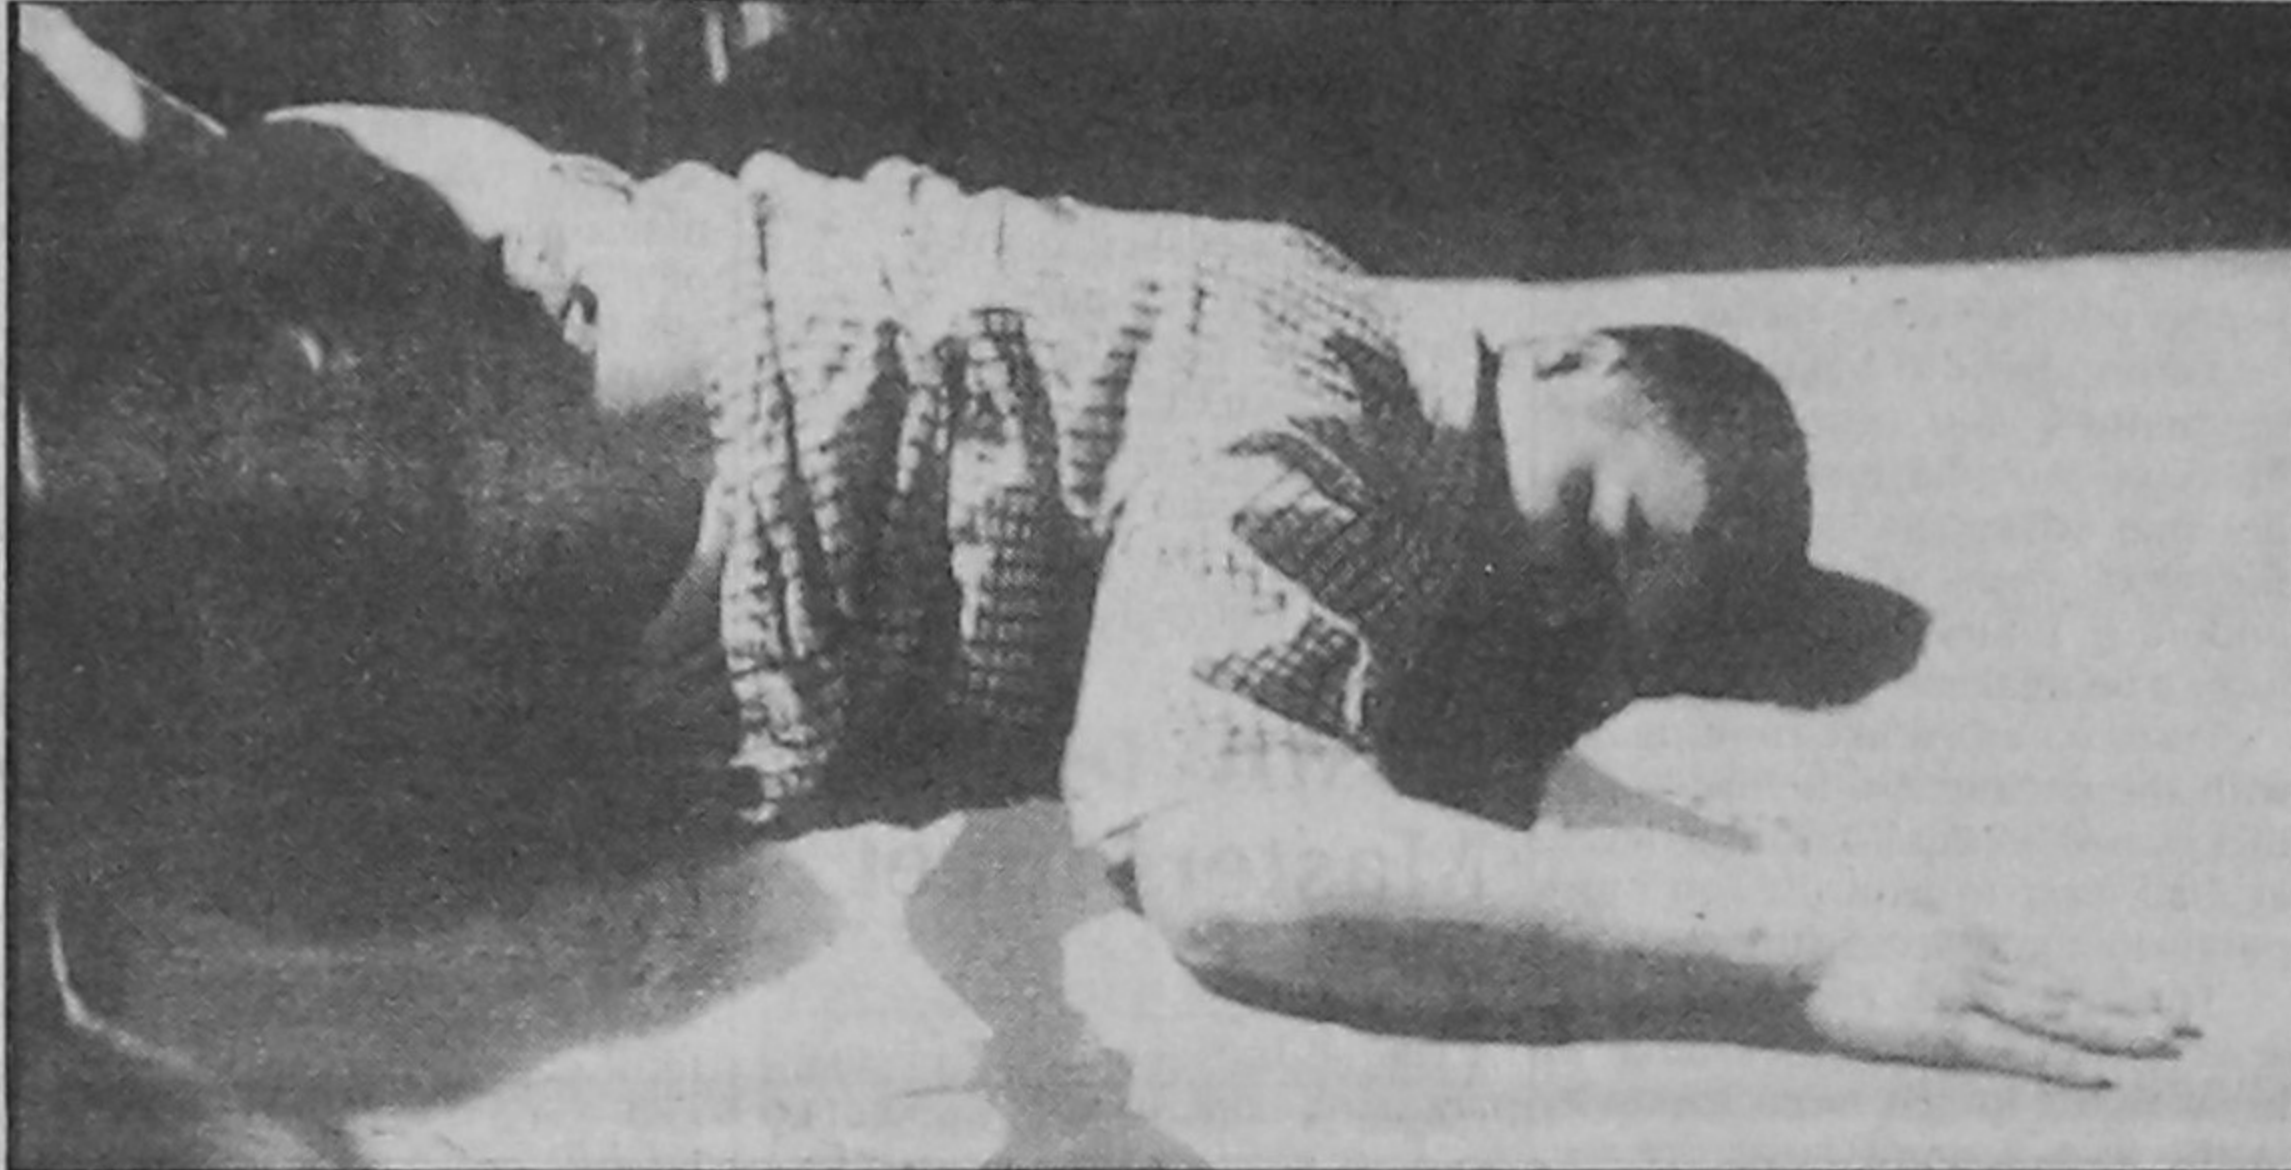

Kausar says, "This film is a section of the '71 struggle and on March 24th the pakistani army had descended mercilessly on the helpless people. This is focused on the Dhaka university campus. This documentary includes interviews with people who were involved with the episodes at the campus. Some have received bullet wounds, some have lost a limb and many have lost their relatives. They are the witness to history. To this is added the wireless conversation of the Pakistan Army in which they discuss how many are killed and how many captured. If the Pakistanis themselves admit to the large number among themselves, you can well imagine what the actual number of the killed and injured were. Also, you get evidence of which halls were attacked. The road blocks were supposed to be accompanied by killing and punishment. We get proof of their brutality from their own mouths.

"This film was begun in '93 and it took me a lot of time to trace down the people were all out of my own pocket. The rising against the Pakistanis was not a casual affair. Our struggle had a definite cause and a leadership. Since '47 and the Language Movement, we had been struggling for a definite identity. The '71 killing involved a lot of innocent people and the 50 minute documentary focuses on this. Since I could not cover entire Bangladesh, I took the University campus as a sample.
