

Addiction alarmingly up in southern districts

STAFF CORRESPONDENT, Barisal

Drug addiction is on an alarming rise in the southern region of the country, as phenisidyl cough syrup -- a common means of alcoholic drug addiction to most addicts -- has become pretty available along with other narcotics.

The phenisidyl syrup has nowadays gained much popularity among the people, particularly the young generation, here as elsewhere in the country due to its low price and availability in comparison to other alcoholic drugs.

The very drug, popularly known as dail to its fans, is easily available at different spots in the cities, districts, thana headquarters and even in villages.

It used to be produced and marketed in Bangladesh by a multinational pharmaceutical company -- May and Baker -- until it was banned. Though production of the syrup is denied in the country, it is still being produced and marketed by the multinational in neighbouring India.

As a result, phenisidyl is now being smuggled into Bangladesh through different border areas.

It is learnt that in connivance with the local influential people, the smugglers, particularly those in the northern districts, illegally bring the drug through the borders and later carry it to different parts of the country.

In the southern districts of Barisal, Patuakhali, Bhola, Jhalakati, Pirojpur and Barguna under Barisal division, phenisidyl traders have a wide network connecting different places of these districts. They use passenger buses, trucks and even microbuses on land routes, while launches, trawlers and sometimes boats are used for carrying out the job.

Experts say that regular intake of phenisidyl gradually destroys the white blood cells (WBC) in the human body and thwarts production of new ones. Thus it often causes failure of the body's internal immune system. Regular use of the syrup may also cause chronic blood diseases like aplastic anaemia and sometimes do harm to the lungs.

Physicians say that codein, a powerful component of the syrup, has the potential to cause obstructive jaundice and some special kinds of allergic problems. It may also lead to liver pain, hallucination and pressure on the gallbladder.

Regular phenisidyl intake may destroy the hormonal regulatory balance of the body, decreasing normal interest in sexual activities and eventually making an individual totally impotent. Ephedrine, another component of the syrup, usually leads to high blood pressure and sometimes causes sudden death due to massive cardiomyopathy and heart failures.

Experts also say that if a phenisidyl addict with higher dose-taking habit stops taking it for a long time and then suddenly starts it anew with old dose, he may face severe health hazards as reaction to the overdose.

Unofficial sources said phenisidyl syrup of Indian origin is smuggled into the country in 125ml bottles. Besides, below-standard products with fake expiry dates also pour across the borders almost unabated.

According to a survey report, lower middle and lower class people usually take the syrup out of family and social frustration while others take it as a means of relief from anxiety, tension and depression.
