

A landmark HC verdict

Lessons to learn

THE High Court judgement upholding the death sentence on three policemen for raping and murdering a 17-year-old domestic worker named Yasmeen is a milestone that must be welcomed. It has provided a glimmer of faith in the justice system. It has also become an example, the first of its kind, against custodial crime in this country. Three policeman who raped and killed young Yasmeen after she had trustingly agreed to take a ride home in their van outside Dinajpur town, some seven years ago, have been sentenced to death.

But justice for Yasmeen and her family has taken a long time to come. This is one of the most daunting lessons to be gleaned from this landmark case. Yasmeen's rapists and murderers might never have been brought before a lower court because initially, a swift cover up was launched to falsify the autopsy report and remove evidence of foul play. It was only after the people of Dinajpur exploded, with public demonstrations that led to seven deaths, and this was followed by a groundswell of protests by a strong feminist lobby, as well as by the media, that the authorities took steps to expose the true culprits. Yasmeen's body was exhumed, another autopsy was performed, a case was ultimately framed and the unprecedented process of prosecuting members of the police force was started, and pursued.

Is this what must be done for every victim who is raped or killed by the police? Do the public have to raise an outcry each time another custodial death is reported? The need for such an option only goes to show the weakness in the justice system, especially in cases where the law enforcers themselves are the criminals.

The loopholes now present in making a case stick against a law enforcer must be plugged. Exemplary punishment as well as reform of the penal code and evidence law are necessary, but mechanisms of swift accountability are critical. As we have said before, in cases where the police themselves are accused or implicated in a crime, an independent authority with clearly mandated objectives must move in swiftly to prevent any undermining of justice. We urge the authorities to undertake steps immediately to provide for such a mechanism to ward off police excesses, especially custodial tyranny leading to deaths.

Cost of deforestation

Enforcement of law is the only way out

CERTAINLY, a lecture on global warming and how large-scale deforestation expedites it would be wasted on illegal loggers and timber traders. Their myopic perception of profit would not allow them a look beyond the booty of a few lakh or crore takas that bending the rule here and bribing some government officials there would bring them. Therefore, the question is more of enforcement than of sensitisation. Unfortunately, enforcement, especially in the case of environmental transgression, is simply non-existent.

At the inter-governmental level, Bangladesh is one of the pioneers when it comes to signing and ratifying different global conventions against environmental degradation. In fact, just a few days back, Dhaka signed the historic Stockholm Convention that seeks ban on the "dirty dozen" of persistent organic pollutants (POPs). The government's activism, however, ends then and there more often than not. As a result, deforestation, encroachment on natural water bodies, indiscriminate dumping of toxic effluents into canals and rivers, etc take place with disdainful regularity.

As we understand, laws on environmental degradation are plentiful. Time has come to take them out of the pages of the books of law, apply these against the transgressors. The arm of the illegal timber trader is longer than the authorities believe. It is highly probable that high-ups at the relevant ministries, directorates and departments and, needless to say, on the local administration are also part of the sinister circle.

The task for the enforcement agencies is well cut out. There is a ban on collection of timber from reserved forests till 2005. So, there cannot be any permit, 'jote' or whatever, issued to any timber traders. Whoever issues it, no matter how high a position he or she holds in the department or the ministry, is liable to criminal procedure. Easier said than done, it may sound like. However, it has to start at some point.

Ideally, 25 per cent of a country should have forest cover. In Bangladesh, it is now less than seven per cent. If we fail to stop deforestation now, we risk desertification. There is one other thing the authorities must know: the damage that the felling of full-grown trees does to the ecosystem cannot be offset by occasional and highly publicised plantation campaigns.

India and Pakistan: Burying the hatchet?

AFTER a year-and-a-half of stand-off, almost suddenly India and Pakistan are going to resume negotiations at the highest level. This is a welcome development for the sub-continent. In the light of past unfortunate experiences, there is need for caution and not allow euphoria get the better of the situation.

Indo-Pakistan relations have had many ups and downs, mainly downs. The latest derailment of relations took place nearly a year and half ago, when the present Chief Executive of Pakistan, Chief of the Army Staff Gen. Pervez Musharraf toppled the elected Government of Nawaz Sharif. In the coup prone Pakistan this was a curious one. Gen. Musharraf was travelling abroad. Sensing trouble, Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif prepared to arrest him and went to the length of disallowing the plane carrying the General to land on Pakistani soil. It was too late. The military overthrew Nawaz Sharif and interned him. Gen. Musharraf assumed power and after a few months sent Nawaz Sharif to exile in Saudi Arabia. Thus Sharif met a similar fate with his predecessor Prime Minister Benazir former US President Bill Clinton. Nawaz Sharif travelled to Washington DC and signed the agreement. The act of Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was deeply resented by the powerful Pakistani military establishment, who started a whispering campaign against Sharif accusing him of cowardice and sell out. The inevitable result was the coup that overthrew him. The infiltration of Pakistani forces

ies. It is this aspect that must have galled Vajpayee for he must have genuinely wanted reestablishment of friendly links. When this was in progress that the Pakistan military establishment would strike in the high Himalayas and rekindle the Kashmir dispute, may have been too much for Vajpayee to swallow. Pakistan found no support for her coup. Indeed we live in a time, free with Gen. Musharraf. This situation continued for a year and a half. When Pakistan was feeling the pinch of isolation from the international community, a life line was thrown by China, a longtime Pakistan ally. Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji paid an official visit to Pakistan and praised Pakistan leadership effusively. This was like music in the ears of Gen. Musharraf and he was full of praise for the excellent

There have been so many false starts between India and Pakistan over the last half of a century of their independent existence that it is impossible not to be extremely wary. There are many points of discord but the most serious one is Kashmir. The two sides have fought three wars and the result is a stalemate. From a bilateral dispute between India and Pakistan it has become a near triangular question with the Kashmiris wanting to have their voice included as well. Although China has remained aloof from the dispute, it is impossible not to get a sense of their presence.

In their mad rush to compete with each other India and Pakistan have become nuclear powers. Thus India and Pakistan are the only developing nations who possess the bomb. For two impoverished nations, where live teeming millions, this is a situation fraught with dangerous possibilities. Since the world is not ready to shed its nuclear arsenal, we have to live with this dangerous situation. After half a century of endless bickering both India and Pakistan must have come to the conclusion that it was time to bury the hatchet and turn a new page.

from coups and Democracy is assuming gale force throughout the world. The regime of Gen. Musharraf was ostracized and most importantly by India. India broke virtually all links with Pakistan including refusal to play cricket. South East Asian Regional Co-Operation (SAARC), moribund in the best of times remained paralyzed because India refused to sit Sino-Pakistan friendship. It is tempting to speculate that the remarks of the Chinese Premier may have set a chain reaction and we witness the Pakistani coup leader getting out of isolation. Indeed India has withdrawn her ban on Pakistan and has signalled her readiness to resume relations within SAARC and start playing cricket!

A welcome development, indeed

IT is something like a "great event" in the existing south Asian scenario: Vajpayee and Musharraf are going meet late June or early July. The developments over the last nearly two years have spelt only some sort of doom for the region, there has hardly been anything to cheer about. The overall political climate has nose-dived. The meeting of the heads of government of seven-nation South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) still hangs in the balance although it was scheduled to take place in November, 1999. The SAARC brings the member states on a common platform jettisoning the divide as far as possible but its summit could not be held because of increasingly worsening political environment that has gripped the region, even the cricket teams of India and Pakistan refusing to play against each other. What an undesirable situation persists in the area where nations often boast of "commonality" because of their historical background. True, this "commonality" and neighbourliness have also spawned some bitterness and enmity but a regional feeling should also act positively as much as it did in the formation of the SAARC overcoming many a hurdle. South Asia has several countries but there is no denying that the atmosphere here is bedevilled mainly because of the rivalry and traditional animosity between the two principal actors India and Pakistan. When these two nations greet each other with a friendlier approach, things move for the good and conditions deteriorate when they demonstrate hostilities and belligerence. True, the bilateral ties between other countries also at times contribute to an unhealthy situation in the region but it is broadly the Indo-Pak relationship that casts considerable impact in the area. It is in this context that there has been an unexpected "big news" and it is of the forthcoming

MATTERS AROUND US

"Peace must be given a chance" and this chance must not be exhausted. The summit is not only seen as a landmark for two countries in the current circumstances but also for the whole south Asian region. It will at least lead to one positive outcome-- the official decision of two sides to continue efforts towards improving ties.

summit between the leaders of two countries. Till the surprise announcement was made in New Delhi that Indian prime minister Atal Behari Vajpayee has invited Pakistan's military ruler General Pervez Musharraf for talks on the bilateral issues, little likelihood was discernible that the two countries would resume their earlier talks at the official level in the near future. The foreign-secretary level discussions are stalled for nearly two and a half years and the composite talks covering different fields in the bilateral ties have also been discontinued for a long time.

Indo-Pak contacts have virtually been frozen for about two years and the fallout of this terribly disappointing condition has extended even to the field of sports, specially cricket which is a passion in south Asia. Against such a background, the news that the Indian prime minister has shown the olive branch and that too in a big way like inviting the chief executive of Pakistan for talks obviously came as a big but pleasant surprise to many. When impression was gaining ground that a meeting of the foreign secretaries of the SAARC countries in Colombo on June 8 and 9 is likely to pave the ground for a conference of SAARC foreign ministers which in turn may encourage a summit of their leaders, the news of Indo-Pak summit is indeed refreshing. For, it is the stalemated relations between these two countries and more pointedly the known reluctance of the Indian prime minister to meet the army ruler of Pakistan that have made the SAARC summit difficult. The summit was called off at the request of India as New Delhi's ties with Islamabad had reached a sort of nadir in the aftermath of "Kargil." Then the military take-over in October, 1999 in Pakistan by toppling the elected government of prime minister Nawaz Sharif came as a further blow. The seizure of power by army chief General Pervez Musharraf had adverse effect on two counts as far as relations with India were concerned. First, India did not relish the removal of a democratically chosen government in the neighbouring country regardless of the differences between the two countries and secondly the person who was seen by New Delhi as largely responsible for the "Kargil" crisis rose to power there. India gave no reason for the postponement of the SAARC summit except saying that the atmosphere was not conducive, but it was a known fact that prime minister Vajpayee wanted to avoid meeting Gen Musharraf in the summit where bilateral meetings also take place on the sideline of the main event.

Indo-Pakistan ties have not improved much since then but some positive indications were discernible over the last few months. The devastating earthquakes in Gujarat in India prompted neighbour Pakistan to express sympathy and send relief materials for the victims and the gesture was appreciated in India. The decision to hold SAARC foreign secretary level meeting in Colombo is also a step in the right direction since such a meeting was also put in limbo for long. But the sudden development centering a summit between the two countries in the near future has overshadowed all other occurrences that have taken place in a positive spirit. The offer of the Indian prime minister has been accepted without any condition by Gen Musharraf, who had earlier expressed his willingness to talk to the Indian leader anytime anywhere. Now the stage is set for the talks barring any unforeseen development late June or early July. It could be delayed if the officials take longer time to prepare the ground. Whatever the timing of the meeting and whatever comes out of it, both countries deserve kudos for the decision. India certainly be given extra felicitation for taking the initiative for the summit.

Arguably, summits between the two hostile neighbours in the past failed to produce anything of much substance and, consequently, no qualitative change took place in the relationship. While the ties are marked by unfriendliness, at times they are reasonably good in the given situation. The last Indo-Pakistan summit took place in February, 1999, when prime minister Vajpayee and his Pakistani counterpart at that time Nawaz Sharif met in Lahore and vowed to improve ties based on the "Lahore declaration." It was a sad story that within few months the spirit of the declaration evaporated and they were on the verge of war on "Kargil" in which India saw Pakistan at faults while Islamabad blamed New Delhi for not giving Kashmiris their due.

The disputed territory of Kashmir, two thirds of which is controlled by India and one third by Pakistan, is the main bone of contention between the two countries. The positions of two neighbours, which fought more than one war on this dispute, are wellknown. India while extending invitation to the Pakistani military ruler for talks, also scrapped a ceasefire in the troubled region against the Kashmiri militants. Pakistan criticised this decision of India, saying headline postures would not help attain peace in Kashmir. One should not expect that big differences on Kashmir would disappear easily. In fact, it is so

DCC's election gimmick
The belated DCC demolition drive in the metropolis looks like a pre-election gimmick, as it is too big a job that has been taken up too late and with too short a time to complete. Obviously, there are Rip Van Winkles in this corporation also, who wake up before the elections. When a regime cannot run a city, how can it run a country? The citizens are treated like sitting ducks by the city fathers and the 'godfathers'. The DCC cannot run the way it is being administered now.

PM crying "Wolfl"
How will the people of a poor country like Bangladesh bear the expenses of providing life long security for Sheikh Mujibur Rahman's family? In a country which is still in its infancy in terms of democracy, introduction of a law to this effect is equivalent to monarchism. When we speak of democracy we need to believe it and follow it in our life. In a democratic country, all should be treated equally. Before Sheikh Hasina asks for her own security, she should ensure security for each and every citizen. This should be the most important duty of her government, because the money that would be spent on her and her family's security will come from the taxpayer's pocket. It is true that the law and order situation of the country has gone to the dogs, but it is because the politicians nurture terrorism. Considering the situation in Laxmipur, Feni and in Dhaka, where the government is providing shelter to its goons, it is really surprising that Sheikh Hasina could ask for her security. Is she afraid of her own people? If the government has done good to the people, there's no need to be afraid of them. The prime minister's problem is like that of the shepherd who used to cry "Wolfl" all the time.

No way out
In the report, "Resident students of DU at mercy of BCL activists" (May 12), The Daily Star has done a marvellous job. We expected the Dhaka University Authority (DUA) to take steps to rectify the situation. But surprisingly, the DUA has refused the report saying that it is not true that BCL activists controlled seats in the residential halls. And to support the rejoinder the DUA has said, "If this was true in any way, some persons would have had drawn the attention of the authorities."
This response is shocking. Is there any reason, logic or necessity to bluff the public by giving such a statement? Is the DUA aware of the situation on the campus? Where does the DUA live when the campus is reverberating with the sound of firing by the political cadres or terrorists? Are they firing to practice towards the sky?
It is well-known that most of the students of DU come from middle-class families and many students cannot be adequately supported by their families. They have to rely fully on tuition jobs. They cannot think of living off-campus in rented flats. These brilliant but poor residential students are victims of hall politics. They are called upon to join political processions, and if they decline, they are threatened with ouster from the halls. They are forced to participate in many other political functions that occur in the halls almost every day.
Under these threatening circumstances, how can a student dare to lodge a complaint against members of a cadre? If a student were to think of making an allegation against an activist, he would first have to prepare himself to leave the hall.
Even when a student does lodge a complaint, the authorities do not stand by him. Evidence either vanishes mysteriously or is not considered relevant by the authorities. As a result, ordinary students never complain. They know that they will never get justice. They have to take the torture lying down. Obviously, these students want to get their own back on the political cadres, leaders, activists, and also the Dhaka University Authority.

No hope for Biman
At a recently held privatisation and private sector investment workshop, it was announced that Biman's privatisation process has come to a standstill due to lack of international airlines wanting to form a partnership under the present terms and conditions, with only two Biman competitors showing interest. Was this surprising?
One can sympathise with Biman's managing director when he said the privatisation process was on but that it was not easy to privatise an airline. As expected, when discussing the privatisation process and private sector investment, the usual suspects of lack of political will, bureaucratic red tape, corruption and unhealthy trade union activities were attributed to the rather slow pace of investment and privatisation.

the long term)?
It is not just privatisation of Biman that needs to be looked at, but the mentality of the Bangladesh privatisation process. We want to privatise government owned industries that only lose massive amount of money and are a financial drain, but we offer little or no incentive to those who may be willing to take over the industries. We offer only bureaucracy, red tape, or union 'goonism'. We expect someone to take over an ailing company but keep all the employees, hinder import of new and needed equipment with red tape and excessive duty.
Privatisation in Bangladesh is a buzzword, not a process. Can anyone in government or in business give one reason why any businessman, industrialist or entrepreneur should be interested in privatisation?

Drain trap
We can't walk on our streets any more. Why is it that the sanitation department of the DCC digs out all the muck from the drains during the rainy season and leaves it beside the drains (taking up road-space) from where the muck goes right back into the same drains? Don't these workers have supervisors; is anyone checking up on their work?

Seasonal standing water around the buildings can cause eventual deterioration of house foundations, the driveways, the road surface, the mechanical vehicles that have to travel through these waters, and it corrodes and damages practically everything that is immersed for long periods of time.
Most of the waste that enters a septic system is decomposed by bacterial action. Non-decomposed solid matter settles as sludge to the bottom, oily waste floats on top as scum, and the liquid between, known as effluent run off, if it can.
What the DCC is doing is getting all the sludge, scum and effluents and dumping them on the road. Rain comes and mixes with this muck, and all the pedestrians are walking through the middle of this slime, and some of these people are coming into our homes as maidservants, drivers, even cooks. We have all made this connection in our mind, I'm sure.
Then, why aren't our city planners doing something about it?
Our municipal storm sewer system is perilously inadequate, and until and unless we address this fundamental problem we'll be faced with this crazy situation year after year. It would be more cost-effective to undertake serious rebuilding and (enhancement) reconstruction of the drainage system, part by part, all over this city. We could eliminate so many related problems and hazards just by doing this bit. Think about that!

Our identity
The name of our country as well as the national flag and national anthem have all been changed after the War of Liberation in 1971. With its own national flag and national anthem, Bangladesh became an independent and sovereign country.
Unfortunately, the mentality of some people has not been changed yet. They want to be acknowledged as pro-Pakistani or pro-Indian. Until and unless we get rid of these parasites, the future of this country is bleak.
Our only identity is that we are Bangladeshi. We are proud to be Bangladeshi and would remain so till death.
