Summer treat for the young and trendy

Kay Kraft's nouveau fest

SHAHANA PARBEEN

HERE was a time when the fashion conscious used to look forward to Eid for the few and large boutiques to launch new designs to treat themselves to. People looked up their calendars to see how long it would be before Eid would come around the corner to relieve them of their apparently boring attires and let try on new designs, themes and colours.

In those days, fashion was limited to the elite few, who could afford the exorbitant prices at which these cloths were sold. But now, thanks to the enthusiastic entrepreneurship of creative designers, boutiques are mushrooming all around the city. And in conformity with the laws of economics, the increase in supply has let prices have come down within the purchasing power of a much wider range of income group. Its now quite normal to see young college going ladies to be attired in boutique outfits, thanks to the affordable prices.

Designers have been trying to break the traditional mindset that Eid is the only time for fashionable wear. That every season can be an occasion to celebrate, that it brings in its unique mood and that this can be reflected in what one chooses to wear, is an idea that they are trying to make consumers aware of. In their unrelenting effort to encourage customers to buy designer dresses more often than the 'twice-a-year-treat-on-Eid', more boutiques are now coming up with collections for different seasons. For example, there's the Borsha (rainy season) collection, winter collection, summer collection and, of course, the flamboyant Eid collection.

"Kay Kraft", one of the very popular boutiques in the city, has been holding summer collections for the past four years. This year's exhibition titled Summer Fest, was held at WVA auditorium. The exhibition which ran for four days from the 24th to 28th May, had over 100 new designs on display. There were saris, shalwar-kameezes, fatuas, punjabis, t-shirts and other tid-bits. The emphasis had been on cotton. They had used white, biscuit, brown and other light bases on which bright hues were used for motifs.

used on the dresses namely spray, tie-dye, machine embroidery, nakshi kantha etc. There were variation in cuts too. There was a pretty light yellow sleeveless dress in angarakkha cutting with a white churidar and georgette oma. It was decorated with red and black motifs. Shahnaz Khan said that demand for sleeveless dresses was very high so they were going to supply those on order. There were silk dresses for party wear too. The dress collection was priced within a range of Tk.800 to Tk. 3000.

There were a large variety of men's wear too. Half-sleeved block printed shirts, fatuwas with interesting cuts and use of different materials, white cotton punjabis with kantha and bhorat work, t-shirts (a hit with girls too) with block print, screen print, hand painting of anything and everything like fishes, shoes, scenery, young women etc were on display. Men were not to be deprived of party wear either. Silk punjabis in sherwani cutting with a plenty of gorgeous embroidery were put on display. These punjabi's in joy silk were in deep rich colours like maroon, black as well as the ever popular white and biscuit shades.

Young ladies had a variety of interesting accessories to choose from. These items were made of silver, terra cotta and a interesting material: seeds!! Matched with dresses, these could make great wear. Not to be outdone were the brightly coloured hair clasps with block, embroidery etc work on them to go along with shalwar-kameezes.

The exhibition included candles, albums and other trinkets for sale. All these will be available at the "Kay Kraft" outlets around the city.

So, for the fashion conscious people out there to beat the heat, "Kay Kraft" has a whole range to offer.
