Exhibition

An exhibit to save Shawon

A charity show to raise funds at Drik

FAYZA HAQ

In order to collect funds for cancer ridden Shawon, a number of artists, specially Rashid Khan, donated their paintings and sketches which were on display at Drik. Ariful Islam Shawon is a student of the Physics Department of DU and has recently been diagnosed with blood cancer. At this stage of his illness he can be cured through bone marrow transplant for which approximately Taka 50 lakhs is required.

Rafiqun Nabi's sketch with paints brought in a bird with its fledgling. The bird was outlined with black and had strokes of orange, brown, green and gray. Its eyes and beak was red. Its little one was done with gray with brown. The ground on which the two stood had equally dramatic strokes with brown, yellow and gray while the background was left stark white.

Hashim Khan's painting had three large kites flying high in the sky. One was pale blue, one golden and orange and the last red. There were happy figures of the children playing with the kites at the bottom. Against an expanse of green were birds flying and these were in white, touched with orange, indigo and black. One the right background were splashes of gray to offset the bright colours used elsewhere. This painting brought in the happiness of childhood.

In "Green and gray" by AB Alvi brought in a rectangular mass of sap green with black on top. There were touches of white. At the bottom were scratches of black against white. This appeared to be simple aerial view of our land with its greens and grays. This was an abstract with two colours offset by white.

Uttom Sen's mixed media had two hands struggling up from below a cemented footpath. One hand had clung on to the pavement the other was thrust up horizontally as if in defiance. In the background houses, cars and people were brought in with pen and ink sketches and touches of pink, orange and indigo. This depicts the hand of struggle. Sen's other work brought figures of protest in an abstract manner with a vermilion piece of cloth stuck on with white and black painted on it. In the backdrop were splashes of blue and white with traces of ink lines. One could detect one image facing forward while the other looked sideways at the back. His oil on canvas showed a young woman standing against a background of green. Her hair was a mass of black while her body had shades of gold and pink. The tree was the conventional brown with touches of yellow, orange and green. A full moon and boats were in the backdrop along with more trees. In the foreground were a piling of shades of gray, green and orange.

Khayar's sketch had figures seen walking and carrying loads. The view was from the back and the people were wearing "lungis" and lugging vessels and bundles. There were more figures at the back, lifting their "lungis" a bit to walk with ease. This was a typical Bangladeshi road scene done in black and gray crayon sketches with a background of stark white.

Karu Titash's work with corrugated paper that was painted blue, green and brown had broken bits of brick images and more flecks of white, blue and red. The abstract composition gave the impact of an old wall. His other work again had a piece of corrugated paper in a collage with touches of red, white, blue, yellow, black and red. The patches of paper had been mounted on the crinkled paper to form a composite whole. One got the impression of an old wall separated by a piece where the cement layer had fallen.

Rashid Khan's, who donated about ten works, had lotus in shades of pale pink while the stems of the average bland green with a background of orange. This was an experiment with few lines. "Voice" brought in a part of a mother with the details of her bangles, lips, eyes, hair and sari. Next to her was her child and behind her was a boat with a bamboo pole. Her other sketch was also partly done and partly left unfinished on purpose and lent mystery to the creation. His "Innocence" brought in a fragmented image of a child playing with a cycle and finding enormous joy in that. This was light brown pencil drawing like most of his works.

In an oil painting by Rashid Khan we saw green and brown fish with their fins and scales having been done prominently. Underground leaves were done in green and orange. The background was left white so that the subjects stood out. His other work brought in a gate in old Dhaka which was done with soft washes of orange and yellow. The brick part at the sides were in brick red and gray. At the sides and in front was pink to offset the Old Dhaka architecture. Rashid Khan's "Voyage to Infinity" showed people in pen and ink sketches done in minute scale and seen against a vast expanse of the sky done in shades of blue and white. The men were seen walking or riding rickshaws or pulling carts or rolling cycle tires. He had also painted his and leaves were bold splashes of colours while the vase was a simple rectangle. The simplicity of the oil colour was delightful. Fahreen's depiction of a village brought in hay stacks, trees, hedges, chopped tree trunks with green undulating fields at the back and women at work in the forefront, busy with chicken and bowls of rice to be threshed. Giant clouds were included in the background.

Abu Salim's painting had fish, the "baul's" "ek-tara" farmer and his wife, birds, fish, a mango, a Bangladeshi fan with frilled edge, and a beetle leaf. The farmer and his companion were done in pale colours and appeared to be fading out into the background. Shades of black, red and brown were brought with green.

studio on a panel of four planks of wood set against a border or more wood. On the planks the artist had painted a still life of jars, bowls, more containers with paint brushes. This had a variety of colours ranging from brown and orange to blue and white.

A still life by Fahreen brought in purple flowers highlighted by white, seen with leaves in an elongated vase. This was done in an impressionistic manner where the flowers brought in a horse that is speeding with flowing mane, hooves, face and tail with its body clearly formed by the lettering of "Ghora china jaye maidaney, bondhu china jaye nidaney". Arham had another calligraphy piece that presented a vivid flying kite with the words "Ghuri urey toto porey".

The effort to collect a contribution through the sale of paintings and sketches was a bold and laudable venture indeed.
