Hand Puppetry -a new venture

HAT could be another of those usual cultural events, turned out, instead, to be an extravaganza in puppet theatre that provided immense amusement for a large group of the audience, comprising children and adults who were present at the auditorium of Goethe-Institut at Dhanmondi in the city on August 13. This was to witness a hand-puppetry show performed by the members of Center for Asian Theatre (CAT).

Performers of the theatrical troupe demonstrated some relatively newer methods of puppet handling through their innovative home-grown technical, rather, manual advancements. The puppets, glued on top of long hand-held sticks, appeared almost 'alive' on stage as those received apt maneuvering from 'players' behind curtained backstage The puppetry experts lent their voices through necessary dialogues at a theatrical play. A narrator adorned in colourful costumes, described through rhythmic songs, various situations and developments of the depicted plot. He was assisted by a couple of instrumental musicians and a percussionist who were too, was present on stage.

The play titled, 'Al Amin', the name of a young boy, revealed a quite common yet dreadful plight of children of our society who are almost routinely smuggled out to Gulf countries by racketeers in exchange of large amounts of foreign currency. The children a, in most cases, are being forced to work as camel jockeys whose job assignments have been forcing them to ride on backs of racing camels from where they have often fallen to death, and finally being trampled under the hoofs of the desert animals.

Al-Amin, the fictitious character of young boy in the play have been shown trafficked to a country in the Middle East and forced to work as a camel jockey where he apparently met a tragic end of his life, after a nasty fall. As the synopsis revealed, Al-Amin was a good student but his poor parents had failed to provide him with a comfortable life. Mannan Miah. a slv and deceitful villager. who soon turned out to be a professional child trafficking pimp, promised to alter Al Amin's life into a bright one but instead took the boy to a far away land in the desert kingdoms. The father handed Al-Amin over to the pimp, though the mother was against the arrangement. Instead of being sent to the boarding school, Al-Amin had been sold to a second middle-man in India, who, in turn, made money by re-selling the boy to a Karachi dweller. Al-Amin eventually ended well as entertaining them, an approach commonly referred to as theatre-in-education. In addition to raising awareness on trafficking, the play also comprised of other elements aimed at decreasing negative attitude of the common mass on respective issues in the society. The theatrical puppet production also contributed in raising awareness on the importance of education and literacy of guardians in order to understand problems better and to make the best out of one's own situation and to take adequate care of the family. The plot of the production also highlighted on the equal sharing of decisions between husband and wife about children's future. The message of maintaining a small family with lesser number of children also came up as due to a large family and increasing pressure of feeding numerous mouths, Al Amin's parents failed to raise their children properly, hence, sent Al Amin to some unknown destination for earning bread.

Centre for Asian Theatre (CAT) produced Al-Amin after a script was made into a theatrical drama by performers of a workshop conducted under the coordination of Kamaluddin Nilu, Secretary General and Artistic Director of CAT. This was an experimental theatre work mixed with puppet maneuvering as well as live performance. 'Our hand puppet production is a result of a fresh innovation and implementation of one of the easiest technical planning', said

Kamaluddin Nilu, while he elaborated on the hand puppetry topic. As Nilu further mentioned, Bangladesh has had puppet traditions since early times in rural areas and it received further boost through modern-day exposure by puppet experts like Mustafa Monwar and others. However, the new kind of hand puppets, created by CAT members seemed to be the most handy type of toys those could be carried from place to place and performed live along with combination of human narrators under almost every circumstance, in slum areas, schools, streets and other locations. Making of these puppets also meant very little expenditure. Future plans of CAT involving Hand Puppet Theater included new productions with fresh themes alongside performance before cross-section of audience across the country, for the betterment of the society.

Bengal Foundation's publication debut with Sudeep Sen and Mahmud's lyrical and well crafted book, Monsoon

SAIFUL ISLAM

UDEEP Sen's Monsoon, with its fluid poetic prose, illustrated by Mahmud's striking photographs was recently published by the Bengal Foundation. After years of working for the advancement of fine arts and music in Bangladesh, the Bengal Foundation has come up with a laudable new initiative of publishing. From now on, the foundation will also provide an outlet for established and emerging writers of Bangladesh and Bengali themes

In the publisher's note in the colophon, the Bengal Foundation

state: "In Monsoon, two Bengalis from the two Bengals, across two countries have powerfully created much more with their beautifully quiet and controlled gestures, than what is achieved through politics and clever diplomacy."ÊÊ

Both Sudeep Sen and Mahmud seem preoccupied with rainwith its whimsical lyricism, its moisture, its beauty and treachery. In this beautiful new book, the metaphors draw our sight towards rain and charge our senses with objects such as a rain-drenched bursting stamen that titillates the powders of the pollens. Monochromatic photographs are juxtaposed with sensuous lines, as precise poetic prose drizzles with provocation.

Even though some scenes and stories in the book are not entirely unfamiliar to those who know the rainit is the way they are presented, in their exquisite prose and design, that they make us stop on each page and lead us to ponder and think. We

This little book is a marvellous multi-media production, 'Knowledge, Need'. The titles of other chapters like the one cited a book that is a seamless transition above, are clever and impregnated with meaning and allusions. The Last Supper

On HBO at 10:00 p.m. Every Sunday, a group of five college buddies invite a quest over, and exchange views on various topics. When a heated discussion duri one of these gatherings leads to the death of a racist visitor, it gives the quintet a warped idea why not have an undesirable over each week and then kill and bury him!
