Exhibition

The coming together of the class of '83

Exhibition of 19 artists at the Fine Arts Institute Dhaka University

FAYZA HAQ

THE works of the batch of 1983 of the Fine Arts Institute DU brought together a fascinating mosaic of creations of ex-students whose talent had flowered in a manifold manner today. The feelings and emotions of each artist were intense and the delineation brought considerable joy to the viewers.

Rubina Nargis had done some paper boats, which were floating in a background of yellow ochre touched with brown, orange and burnt sienna and it had a framing of brown. These were the childhood memories, which the artist had done in this in oil as oil lasts long and she had graduated from the Painting Department. In the next one too we found paper boats on the edge which was done in greenish yellow with layers of paints. There were touches of ash while the frame too was in ash to bring in depth. Earlier she had done figure composition of women, as she wanted to project the fact that woman were suppressed and that their problems should be held out to the society.

Nargis had participated in various exhibitions such as Gallery 21, Saju Art Gallery, Sheraton water-color exhibits. Now she teaches in Holy Cross School and another school at Banani. She prefers painting to teaching but enjoys teaching children as she feels that they use colours and lines with great imagination. As for her own work she prefers to do something gentle and soothing and nothing overwhelming or shocking. She began in 1990 as professional artist. She felt that women artists now had made great progress as in the case of Rokeya Sultana, Nasreen Begum.

Fazlul Rahman Bhutan had done a painting called "Ill time" with a dog with fangs that is outlined with white. It had teeth sticking out in a manner that gave the impression that the animal was surely rabid. At the back were masks, parts of bodies, bones of men at the back with only their parts of bodies being on display and these held knives and pistols. In the third section was a picture of a woman in black, gray and white tone down with a touch of pink seen behind barbed wires. The artist said that he wanted to portray the social conditions of the country where everything was havoc and nothing was in order. The objects were symbols of social, political and economic chaos. The barbed wire portrayed the fact that the women are still being subjugated and down-trodden.

In another of Bhutan's paintings were three faces done on squares with the facial details of lips, nose and eyes being outlined in black while at the bottom was a profile in bottom were their real selves without pretenses. The texture work done all over was to lend interest.

Bhutan said that he painted as a child and found inspiration from Abdul Hye. His inspirations come from Zainul Abedin, Md Kibria, Rafiqun Nabi, Hashim Khan and Qayyum Chowdhury. Asked if we were not being rather western in our approach of fine art today, Bhutan said that it would be wonderful indeed if we could retain the identity of our country in words such as those of Quamrul Hassan or Jamini Roy. He has participated in joint exhibitions at the Fine Arts Institute and the National Museum and had won an award as a child.

Sanjit Das Apu's painting called "Navigation" and in it he tried to portray the complications in modern life. "All around us we see only mechanical life and this for us is our present reality," said Apu. In it he had brought in circles, blocks which are normally found in a mechanically operated ship or launch. There was a figure in black to the left who appeared to be in torment and seemed to be an integral part of the composition. On top there were a lot of splashes of black, gray, blue and brown and they brought to mind the element of pain although they had been highlighted with yellow and beige at times. They brought in the complexities of contemporary existence.

In Apu's "The inner part of civil life" contained a figure with hands outstretched in agony. This was in black and red while the hands were white. There were parts of a crashed motor cycle included in the painting to enhance the element of confusion in our present day life as well as the recurrent use of mechanization around us. There were yellow streaks all over combined with streaks of blood red on the vehicle with rectangles and squares to denote its mechanical parts. A rectangle of red stood for the car against which the motorcycle had crashed. This had horizontal stripes and squares in it. The background was black while in the forefront was a splash of white.

Apu says, "In our villages such scenes are not seen often but in our cities they are common everyday incidents with which we have to live with. By the accident I want to symbolize our crazy mixed up existence of rushing to and fro work in a wild frenzy. The crash is not a physical and outward phenomenon but something that takes place within us too as regards feelings and emotions. Even in our thought processes there are complications and frustrations. Earlier I had dealt with other subjects such as dreams, which stand for our hopes and aspirations, which are never fulfilled. I am not overly concerned with the sale of my paintings as I do commercial painting such as doing book illustrations, tile painting, etc. I prefer to work at night, as during the day I have to pursue a career to make my living. My prize so far was a poster for environment. Among the artists I like are Hashim Khan, Rafiqun Nabi, Shabuddin and the younger ones like Kanak Campa Chakma".

One found some elements of realism in Dilip Kumar Kahr's in "Composition" in which one saw pushcart pullers resting from the overwhelming heat in the afternoon. The worker had an umbrella on top and was working only a shirt and a "lungi". Everything was in shades of brown, beige, ochre, gray, with touches of mauve, indigo and yellow.

We saw impressionism in his other work too, labelled "Composition". Here again we see a similar theme of workers with their carts taking a respite from their work. We saw them in simple apparels with shades of gray and green with yellow ochre and red to complete the oil on canvas. Dilip said, "I used to see bullock carts in the villages in my youth and coming to Dhaka I was surprised that human beings had to do the work of domesticated animals without complaining. I had expected that by now machines would have replaced human labour of this type in the metropolis. Normally, I'm content to do the local landscapes."

Shumona Haque's painting "Nature" had two fish swimming in the form of suspended geometrical shapes and they were obviously being lured by bait. All across were squares and rectangles, circles, lines and splashes of blue, gray and white, aquamarine and black. In Shumona's other delineation of nature there was white, pink, and green with black and burnt sienna being brought in the backdrop. The browns and greens that we see in nature had been reduced to a semi abstract form.

In Shameem Subrana's mixed media work we saw strips of horizontal shapes with detailed work within the elongated rectangles such as festive bunting and textured work that probably brought in a house in the form of brown and yellow ochre crosses of brown. There were red and black stripes and at the sides were splashes and suggested hazy motifs, which reminded one of falling leaves. The bright greens, orange and blue checks, lines and strokes created a wonderful melange of colours and lines in collage.

It has been wonderful indeed, when a batch of old students could come together in unison to present their combined work to give pleasure to the art lovers in the city.

TODAY'S HIGHLIGHTS

HALLMARK: 8:00 a.m. Dr. Quinn: The Heart Within. Based on the long-running hit television drama, Dr. Quinn and her family journey to post-Civil War Boston where she and her children begin new lives. The conservative society of Boston is a far cry from the frontier towns in which Dr. Quinn formerly practiced medicine for these many years. Daughter Colleen follows in her mother's footsteps and graduates from Harvard Medical School while son Brian decides to become a reporter.

STAR MOVIES: 12:00 p.m. The Last Of The Mohicans. The film is a lush, sweeping epic about the brutal realities of building a new world. Daniel Day-Lewis and Madeleine Stowe are strangers who meet and fall in love amid the chaos of war and the construction of a new country.

PICK OF THE DAY

My Sister's Keeper
On HALLMARK at 7:00 p.m.
This poignant, real-life story of two sisters, Christine and Judy, and their journey of discovery and reconciliation. Christine, who has been diagnosed with schizophrenia disorder, yearns for independence and an "ordinary life," but must rely on others for support. When Judy becomes responsible for her sister's care, her well-ordered personal and professional world are turned upside down.
