

Europe should not be guaranteed IMF top job: Africa

REUTERS, Johannesburg

The IMF must open the selection of its next head to all its members instead of sticking to an unwritten rule of picking a European, African finance ministers and central bank governors said Friday.

Boubaou Bouabre, Ivory Coast finance minister, said after a one-day meeting in South Africa of the ministers and bankers that the tradition of nominating a European as managing director of the IMF and an American president of the World Bank was archaic and negated the principle of good governance.

"These principles were quietly agreed in 1944 when these organisations were formed. But this is 2004 and many things have changed. It is not proper that we have no say in who it is that heads institutions that have a huge impact on how developing countries like ours operate," he told a news conference.

Bouabre said Africans wanted the new head of the Fund, who will replace German official Horst Koehler, to appoint at least one African deputy and technocrats with African experience as advisers in order to better tackle the continent's problems.

The ministers and governors wanted to seek a consensus on how best to increase their participation in World Bank and IMF decision-making and possibly voting rights, Bouabre said.

Africans also tackled initiatives to reduce huge external debt on the continent, harmonise macroeconomic policies and promote intra-African trade, officials said.

Speaking at the meeting, South African President Thabo Mbeki said it was crucial for Africans to unite on an agenda to fight poverty and grow their economies to win international donor and investor confidence.

"Few if any of our developing partners listen to our voice when we speak as individual countries," Mbeki said.

transparency is for all. The selection of the managing director of the IMF will be a good start. If there is a top-class candidate from Africa or Asia, they ought to get the job," Bouabre said.

Africans planned to take their message to Western capitals and were optimistic changes were possible, Bouabre said.

The US Senate Friday approved a $2.36 trillion budget for next year that creates hurdles for making permanent the billions of dollars in tax cuts that are the showpiece of President George W Bush's election year economic plan.

The blueprint also aims to halve this year's expected $477 billion fiscal deficit in three years -- faster than the five years Bush suggested in his $2.4 trillion budget request.

In a marathon session, the Senate rushed through a long list of amendments and then passed the 2005 tax-and-spending blueprint on a 51 to 45 vote shortly after 1 a.m. EST.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, returned to a nearly empty chamber at mid-morning on Friday to formally thank members for their efforts.

"It's very important for us in these very busy times to continue to govern and govern well, and I think yesterday represented just that," Frist said.

Democrats claim the plan does little to reduce the deficit and takes money away from social spending programmes like education and health care to pay for tax cuts.

"We appreciate the Senate passing a budget that stays within the framework the president outlined for meeting our priorities, such as the war on terrorism and strengthening our economy and holding the line on spending elsewhere," said White House Spokesman Scott McClellan.

With some of Bush's own party concerned about the budget deficit, the Senate decided on Wednesday that tax cuts must either be paid for with other funds in the budget or they must get more votes than are usually needed on the Senate floor.

McClellan played down the differences with Bush's plan on tax cuts. "We're early in the process," he said.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office estimates it would cost about $1.3 trillion over 10 years to make permanent the personal and corporate tax breaks that Bush would like.

The House of Representatives' plan is similar to the one passed by the Senate and leaders said they hoped the full chamber could debate it before the April recess.

Democrats say the Bush tax cuts primarily benefit the wealthy and result in inadequate spending on programmes like health care, education and aid to veterans.

"The whole set of performance targets is extremely difficult to achieve," said Arthur Lau at Fitch Ratings agency.

China has set high performance targets for two of its largest banks as they race towards stock market debuts, but analysts said on Friday the targets would be nearly impossible to meet without more government aid.

State-owned China Construction Bank and Bank of China, which are hoping to sell more than $5 billion in shares in 2004 or 2005, were asked to hit profitability and capital strength benchmarks in line with some of continental Europe's top lenders, but below those in the United States and Britain.

Beijing injected $45 billion into the two banks in late 2003, kick-starting a year of financial reform as the government strives to fix a weak link in its economy ahead of 2007, when the industry will open fully to foreign competition.

Analysts said the two lenders cannot meet the objectives, announced late on Thursday, without more government intervention.

They said banks must also be allowed to issue more bonds and Beijing must grant them greater leeway to set interest rates, or allow them into restricted areas, such as broking and consulting.

Democrat says the Bush tax cuts primarily benefit the wealthy and result in inadequate spending on programmes like health care, education and aid to veterans.
