Kopeniker Captain

A social satire on dictatorship

ERSHAD KAMOL

NA G O R I K Natyasampradaya staged the remake production of Kopeniker Captain at the Mahila Samity auditorium.

Nagorik Natyasampradaya produced the play in the early 1980s. It was a time when there was military rule in the country. This could possibly explain why the play got popularity, as a social satire.

The play has been translated and directed by Aly Zaker from the original German play by Carl Zuckmayer. The latter in his play, written in the early 20th century, proved that military power can drive a nation towards destruction. It is not the man, rather the army uniform which has got the power to practice dictatorship. Anybody in an army uniform becomes an autocrat.

The play depicts a middle-aged poor Prussian named Wilhem Voyognot buying an old army uniform from a tailor's shop resulting in an extraordinary array of incidents. He claims himself as an army captain and occupies the town hall of Kopinek. Wilhem Voyognot, in an army uniform plays the same role as an army officer in a state where martial law is in force.

As a director, Aly Zaker is realistic and has followed the European Theatre concept. He has successfully handled three sequences simultaneously. He has created 49 characters using only 21 players. Through a narrator he has unfolded each of the sequence of the play.

A scene from the play Kopeniker Captain

Not using the proscenium stage, Faye Zahir has used a round set containing three steps at the middle of the theatre hall and the audience was placed in a semi-circle covering three parts of the set. His three-step set helps the director to create different sequences in a scene and in the case of characterisation as well. However, the symbolic colour of the set does not match with the theme of the play.

Eminent light designer Nasirul Haq Khokon's design in the play is very flat. Most of the time the use of the general light and also the symbole light effect is not much effective.

It is really appreciable that a big group like Nagorik Natyasampadaya has given scope to the young artists in the play. The teamwork deserves praise. Pantha Shahriar and Auni played their roles well.

Small thoughts

The little things that matter

A search for 'Sonar Bangla' in Dhaka

ON making my way towards Elephant Road one fine holiday, I thought of browsing through the area's many music stores. Preparations for the Independence Day were in progress, while posters and fliers carrying patriotic messages were visible on the city streets. Several youngsters were dressed in the colours of nature, strolling by music stores playing popular patriotic numbers like Purbo Digontey, Joy Bangla Banglar joy, O amar desher mati and a few others, heard just once or twice a year.

Surprisingly enough, many of the stores didn't seem to have the songs I had listed in my mind. For instance, the song Shikal porar chol, which I, along with many other Bangali people of my generation had grown up with, was completely unavailable. I was even more shocked when the sales people simply gaped at me, obviously never having heard of the song ever before.

Next stop, Eastern Plaza, where I knew I would not be turned away with an empty soul and mind. This time however, I took a hold of my swaying emotions and got a grip of my patience, when the music stores declared that they had not even heard of the song. Some of the music stores didn't even have patriotic numbers to offer, other than of course the usual English/Hindi hip-hop and It's the time to disco, not to forget a lot of Bangla hogwash screaming about one's heart bursting out in petty love. I simply turned and walked away when one sales person asked, Appa, gaanta kon bander? (Which band does the song belong to?)

As the new age takes over and generations roll on forward, at this rate, there will be a time when all of us will listen to the techno versions of the age-old patriotic numbers like Mora ekti phul ke baachabo

bole juddho kori, Jagao pothike and O amaaar aat koti phul. The fact that the youth has introduced a new dimension in music, particularly band music, in the country is a welcome development. Fortunately, we have shown and proved the capability of learning and enjoying western forms of music, like jazz, soft rock, reggae and not to mention heavy metal. It's a wonder to see how well today's generation actually mix the Bangla spirit into these foreign forms of music and create a terrific blend.

But does that mean that we forget the compositions and songs made out of sheer desperation, frustration, sorrow, agony and also happiness by finally gaining victory? Do we ignore the fact that millions of souls are still lingering above us, trying to figure out if we are really enjoying this freedom and of course, putting it to the right use?

Let us, the youth, voice out our inner core, scream out the pride we feel in being ourselves and never be ashamed to stand up, hand in hand, remembering the past to build a real future: Emon deshi kothao khuje pabe nako tumi...shokol desher rani sheje amaaar jonmo bhumii.

Pre-teen's film venture

'The lost love story': Film wins prize in Finland

Arjo Shrestho gets honorary diploma

FAYZA HAQ

Afascinating film, called The lost love story, a 10-minute film, made by eight year-old Arjo Shrestho, has recently won an honorary diploma. This was at the Tempara Film Festival in Finland. It is remarkable how such a young film maker has made such a fascinating film, one that has been seen at Kanak Champa Chakma's house. The film took one away from the hustle and bustle and humdrum of life into a soft and gentle world of dreams. It had been combined with reality too in such a subtle way that 'all's well that ends well' was one's impression, having departed the venue of the film viewing, late into the night.

Talking about the films Arjo said, that this was his first venture. He said, 'When I was younger I had gone for film shooting with my father, K M Mithu, and when he rested I played with his Beta camera.' Giving the story-line of his film, The lost love story Arjo said that the heroine, Shiropra and her father were going home from school, when they came across a poor street vendor, Chandu, selling Dwelling on the scene of the birthday, he explained, that the heroine wanted some of the savings to be eventually taken and given to Chandu and given in the form of lots of chocolates.

This was not easy, he added as Chandu (played by Utsho) is naturally poor and lives far away, in the heart of an imaginary village, Kusumpur, in Bangladesh. Shiropra

Asked about the selection of the actors and actresses, Arjo said that he had seen Shahidul Alam Sachhu (the father) and Shireen Bokul (who played the mother) and the Utsho, when he had been exposed to the TV, films and other films, during the process of growing up. Arjo's father had made a film I-Xer Shondhaney on three children and that is where he had come across Utsho. As for Shiropra (the heroine), who is six and studies at Sunnydale School, that's his sister; and who paints, studies and sings -- gently and collectively -- like the rest of his family. The parents of Utsho were his own, Arjo added.

The music in the background had been played by Arjo himself on a toy piano (electrical and battery operated) and a harmonium. This includes Ek din chhui hobey, a song which accompanies the credits. The countries participating in the film festival were USA, Europe, Australia, Asia and Africa. The children's section included 534 film makers.

Arjo Shrestho has won an award for painting from the Shishu Academy when he was six years old and his paintings, which are impressionistic, have been shown in the recent past at Gallery Tone. His other hobbies include cricket, boxing and most other games that boys of his age go in for.

spicy chips. Asked why the father (played by Shahidul Alam Sachhu) appeared flustered at this, Arjo explained that the father was saving up for his daughter's future.

rebels, threatens and intimidates by not cutting her birthday cake. The finale of the film contains dancing in the form of a ballet and scattering of gentle images.

Actor Peter Ustinov dies

Sir Peter Ustinov, one of Britain's most respected actors, has died aged 82. Sir Peter's agent confirmed the actor had died in Switzerland on Sunday night, but could give no further details.

Sir Peter starred in films such as Spartacus, Death on the Nile and Logan's Run, as well as many TV shows.

The son of Russian parents, Sir Peter also worked as an ambassador for the charity Unicef.

Sir Peter's agent Steve Kenis told Sky News: "He would always see the bright side of something, even something that would be very annoying to him or to all of us around him."

Sir Peter was born in London in 1921, after his father, an officer in the Russian Czar's army, refused to take an oath to the Eastern Orthodox church because he was a Protestant.

Ustinov as a slave trader in Spartacus

Educated at the Westminster School in London, he left at 16 because he hated it, but had almost instant success on the London stage. His first play was staged when he was only 19. His acting career lasted more than 60 years, and included Academy Awards for two supporting roles - in 1961 for Spartacus, and in 1965 for Topkapi.

He was also nominated for a best supporting actor Oscar for Quo Vadis in 1951, and best screenplay for 1968's Hot Millions. As well as his acting roles Sir Peter was also a novelist and noted public speaker.

Famous for his rich, musical speaking voice, he was also fluent in French, German, Italian, Russian and Spanish, and could also speak Greek and Turkish. Sir Peter was knighted in 1990.
