AFP, Geneva

tions has been abandoned," a trade source told AFP.

Agriculture was a key element in the Uruguay Round. Although it is also at the heart of the intermediate step, negotiators are trying to achieve by Friday in Geneva, they are largely dealing with leftovers that countries failed to agree on about two decades ago.

"I think there has been progress in agriculture in the sense that it is now on the agenda," said Jean-Pierre Lehmann, an international economic analyst at the IMD business school.

"The same major trading countries are stumbling over the same issues," said John Weekes, a former negotiator for Canada at the World Trade Organisation.

Even if the Geneva meeting is successful, few believe that the Doha round of trade negotiations, launched in the Qatari capital in 2001, will be completed by the due date of the end of the year.

But that would be par for the course.

Beneath the doom-laden headlines, attempts to reform and broaden global rules for free trade through rounds of negotiations (GATT), the WTO's predecessor, focused primarily on paring down barriers for industrial trade because it was dominated by the big economic powers.

"Agriculture is one of the most contentious issues in the trading system, because every country, large or small, rich or poor, has a stake in it," the trade source said.

The architects of the international financial and trade system initiated at Bretton Woods in 1944 had included agriculture in their planning, according to Weekes.

The system was meant to include a trade organisation alongside the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF), to ward off the protectionism that had deepened the Great Depression of the 1930s.

The call reflected mounting concern in both rich and poor countries that after the change trading giant China will grab most of the world market in the sector, driving millions of workers in other nations out of their jobs.

"The international community should create an emergency clothing and textile forum... to put in place a plan of action to head off the crises that will surely emerge," a statement quoting a key union leader in the sector said.

"Who is going to explain to 40 million workers, mostly women in desperately poor countries such as Bangladesh and Mauritius that the jobs carnage in those sectors that will come... is good for them?" asked another leader, according to the statement.

The two, John Evans and Neil Kearney of the two major world groupings of textile and clothing workers, were referring to the winding up on January 1, 2005, of a pact under which countries were allowed to protect national producers in the sector.

The collapse of the Iron Curtain also removed the political trade-offs, while the push for new markets has bred emerging economic powers such as Brazil, China and India, and developing countries want their share.

"I don't recall that in the Uruguay Round, certainly not the Tokyo Round (1970s), that the G-90 (developing countries) took as active a role in the negotiations," Weekes said.

"Whether they did the deal or did not during meetings, they managed to carry on. No round of trade nego-

Unions seek emergency talks on textile trade

Global labour unions called yesterday for the quick creation of an international forum to head off "jobs carnage" when barriers to open trade in textiles and clothing are lifted next year.

The system was meant to include a trade organisation alongside the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF), to ward off the protectionism that had deepened the Great Depression of the 1930s.
