'Iraqi insurgents not giving up'

AP, Baghdad

The recapture of Fallujah has not broken the insurgents' will to fight and may not pay the big dividend US planners had hoped to improve security enough to hold national elections in Sunni Muslim areas of central Iraq, according to US and Iraqi assessments.

Instead, the battle for control of the Sunni city 40 miles west of Baghdad has sharpened divisions among Iraq's major ethnic and religious groups, fueled anti-American sentiment and stoked the 18-month-old Sunni insurgency.

Those grim assessments, expressed privately by some US military officials and by some private experts on Iraq, raise doubts as to whether the January election will produce a government with sufficient legitimacy, especially in the eyes of the country's powerful Sunni Muslim minority.

Even before the battle for Fallujah began Nov. 8, US planners understood that capturing the city, where US troops are still fighting pockets of resistance, was only the first step in building enough security to allow the election to take place in the volatile Sunni areas north and west of Baghdad.

The next steps include solidifying Iraqi government control, repairing the substantial battle damage and winning the trust of the people of Fallujah.

That requires, among other things, an effective Iraqi police and security force.

Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of all US forces in the Middle East, said during a visit to Iraq this week that the Fallujah offensive was a major blow to the insurgents, and he said the only way the US forces and their Iraqi allies can be defeated is if they lose their will.

But we are also under no illusions. We know that the enemy will continue to fight," he told the Pentagon's internal news service.

Speaking to reporters on Capitol Hill, Lt. Gen. Lance L. Smith said the military now had to keep the insurgency from regrouping.

"The issue for us at Central Command is make sure we keep the pressure on the terrorists and not allow another safe haven to occur, and we're going to do that," Smith said.

The Associated Press has learned that US military officials in Iraq concluded the population of Anbar province, which includes Fallujah, Ramadi, has been intimidated by the guerrillas and that the provincial security forces are nonfunctioning and their ranks infiltrated by guerrilla sympathisers.

Before the attack on Fallujah began last week, Prime Minister Ayad Allawi formally dissolved the city's police and security forces, which had fallen under control of the radical Sunni clerics who ran the city.

Calls have already emerged for the January vote to be postponed until security improves. Militant Sunni Arab clerics have called for a boycott to protest the Fallujah attack.

However, Iraq's electoral commission is having none of that.

"The election will take place on schedule under laws which cannot be changed because there is no legislative authority to do so," commission spokesman Farid Ayar said Wednesday.

The clerical leadership of the majority Shia community is also deeply opposed to any delay in the election. The country's premier Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, has been demanding elections since the early months of the US military occupation.

'150 families stranded in Fallujah'

AFP, Baghdad

Some 150 Iraqi families remain stranded in Fallujah, according to the Red Crescent which said it has still not been able to enter the heart of the battered city, where sporadic fighting continued yesterday.

"We are getting conflicting reports about what is happening inside and we were not able to enter Fallujah yet. We have only reached the hospital," said Abdelhamid Salim of the Iraqi Red Crescent Society.

"Right now, our work focuses on providing food, blankets and medical supplies to the families who have managed to flee Fallujah," he said.

A Red Crescent convoy reached Fallujah hospital on the outskirts of the city last week and delivered aid, but withdrew after failing to obtain US authorisation to go inside the city, which lies some 50km west of Baghdad.

Almost two thirds of the city's estimated 300,000 residents fled before US forces backed by Iraqi government troops launched an assault on November 8, the largest military operation in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion.

Most of the civilians who left the city stayed with relatives in Baghdad and other cities, while others are still in camps around Fallujah.

Salim said the Red Crescent was providing assistance to 3,500 refugees families outside the city, including at a camp set up at a lakeside resort.

Bush seeks to mend rift with allies

AFP, Washington

US President George W. Bush's post-election cabinet shake-up has left him with loyal friends in most key US administration positions as he seeks to rebuild Washington's links with traditional allies. Bush met with top congressional leaders Wednesday to discuss his goals for the next four years, two weeks after winning a second term in office in an election that also boosted his Republican Party's majority in Congress.

Bush has appointed several top White House advisers who are close to him to top cabinet posts.

On Wednesday, he named his former White House domestic policy adviser, Margaret Spellings, to succeed Rod Paige as education secretary.

On Tuesday, Bush picked his confidant Condoleezza Rice, the national security adviser, to succeed outgoing Secretary of State Colin Powell, who has reportedly clashed with the administration's hardliners on international policy.

Another close adviser, White House counsel Alberto Gonzales, was named attorney general last week to head the Justice Department.

Since his re-election, Bush has announced that he will travel to Colombia next week and Canada in late November. He also said he will head to Europe, where his decision to invade Iraq last year created a rift with some allies, after his January inauguration.

Bush will be in Chile Friday for the summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum.

One of Bush's biggest challenges will be mending fences with France, whose President Jacques Chirac, an Iraq war opponent, told the BBC that "there's no doubt that there has been an increase in terrorism, and one of the origins of that has been the situation in Iraq."

Despite his plans to meet with allies, Bush does not appear willing to change his foreign policy.

"Now that Condoleezza Rice has been nominated to be the next secretary of state, the whole world seems to be noticing that George Bush is stuffing his second-term cabinet with yes men and women," The New York Times said in an editorial Wednesday.

EU lawmakers okay new commission

AFP, Strasbourg

European Union lawmakers yesterday approved the bloc's new executive commission, ending three weeks of institutional limbo sparked by protests over comments on gays and women by an Italian nominee.

The European Parliament voted by 449 votes in favour to 149 against, with 82 abstaining in the ballot, which was originally due at the end of October but was delayed by the row.

Incoming commission chief Jose Manuel Barroso, who was originally supposed to have taken office on November 1, is now expected to start work in Brussels on Monday, officials said.

"We have a great deal of work to do and we will get down to it," Barroso told lawmakers after the vote.

He thanked the parliament "for the confidence which you've just voiced and vested in me," he said.

"We are going to work hard, give our all to serve the institutions of the EU and all of our citizens."

The parliament's president, Josep Borrell, said the vote marked "a very significant milestone in European history".

Chirac begins summit with Blair

Iraq still a sore point

AFP, London

French President Jacques Chirac begins a two-day visit to Britain yesterday for an annual Anglo-French summit with the issue of Iraq still hanging over relations between the two European powers.

Chirac will also attend festive events to mark the end of centenary celebrations of the Entente Cordiale, the act of friendship that sealed the alliance between Britain and France through two world wars.

On the eve of his official visit, Chirac, who led European opposition to the US-led invasion in March 2003, said he was "not at all sure" that the world had become safer since the downfall of Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

In a BBC television interview, aired on Wednesday evening, Chirac suggested that the situation in Iraq - where US forces are still locked in battle with insurgents -- has helped to prompt an increase in terrorism.

"To a certain extent Saddam Hussein's departure was a positive thing," said Chirac when asked if the world was now a safer place, as US President George W. Bush has repeatedly stated.

"But it also provoked reactions, such as the mobilisation in a number of countries, of men and women of Islam, which has made the world more dangerous," he said.

"There's no doubt that there has been an increase in terrorism and one of the origins of that has been the situation in Iraq. I am not at all sure that one can say that the world is safer."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair is US President George W. Bush's staunchest ally on Iraq.

The summit -- which precedes Britain's turn at the helm of the Group of Eight and, in the second half of 2005, the European Union -- will touch upon Iraq and the Middle East among other issues, officials say.

Blair has declared that he considers a renewed quest for peace between Israel and the Palestinians as a personal priority -- a message he took to Washington a week ago when he saw Bush after the US elections.

Chirac, who last visited London a year ago, was to arrive in the capital -- with six ministers and 40 French members of parliament in tow -- on Thursday morning when he will inspect a guard of honour before meeting Blair.

Annan urges swift end to Sudan war, Darfur crisis

AFP, Nairobi

UN chief Kofi Annan yesterday called for talks on ending Sudan's civil war to be concluded swiftly, telling a special session of the Security Council that it would help reverse the worsening crisis in the western region of Darfur.

"There is no time to waste," Annan warned the UN Security Council meeting in Kenya, in its first session outside its New York headquarters in 14 years.

"The speedy conclusion of the North-South talks would not only help curb the further spread of conflict to other parts of the country, it would also serve as a basis and catalyst for the resolution of existing conflicts," the UN secretary general said.

Both the Khartoum government and the southern-based Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army (SPLM/A) said this week they expected to sign a deal to end their 21-year-old war within days of resuming negotiations on November 26.

Rebels in the Christian and animist south rose up against the Arab-led, Islamic Khartoum government in 1983, and a final accord to end the war in which some 1.5 million people are believed to have died appears close.

The bulk of the deal has been thrashed out over the last two years in Kenya, with key protocols on power and wealth sharing already struck, leaving only details of a comprehensive ceasefire and some military security arrangements to be ironed out.

"I cannot help feeling that the formation of a north/south government in Sudan would add weight and impetus to the search for a settlement in Darfur and elsewhere," said Annan.

Sudanese Vice-President Ali Osman Taha and SPLM/A leader John Garang both addressed the Nairobi meeting.

A separate conflict erupted in western Darfur in February 2003 the government quashed an indigenous rebellion was put down with the help of Arab militias, spawning what the UN terms the world's worst humanitarian crisis.

Bush picks loyalists for education, counsel jobs

REUTERS, Washington

President Bush picked two trusted advisers with roots in his native Texas to fill the jobs of education secretary and White House counsel on Wednesday, the latest additions to a second-term staff that includes key loyalists.

White House domestic policy adviser Margaret Spellings, 46, was selected to replace Rod Paige in the top education post. White House deputy chief of staff Harriet Miers, 59, succeeded Alberto Gonzales as White House legal counsel.

Nato ambassador Nicholas

Burns emerged as a possible candidate for deputy Secretary of State or another top job at the department. Burns worked with Secretary of State-designate Condoleezza Rice on Soviet affairs during the administration of Bush's father and also served in the Clinton administration.

In addition to Burns, Arnold Kanter, a former member of Bush's father's administration, was also said to be under consideration for the deputy job. But some sources were skeptical Kanter, viewed as a moderate internationalist Republican, would be selected.

Palestinian leaders hold more talks with factions

AFP, Gaza City

The interim Palestinian leadership was holding a round of talks with various factions in Gaza City yesterday, including the mainstream Fatah movement, officials told AFP.

Former prime minister Mahmud Abbas, who now heads the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) since Yasser Arafat's death last week, was meeting with the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP).

Interim president Rawhi Fattuh and prime minister Ahmed Qorei were meeting meanwhile at the parliament's offices in Gaza City.

The three were set to hold other talks with Gaza representatives of Fatah's central committee, the People's Party -- former communist party -- and the Palestinian Democratic Union (FIDA) later Thursday.

Abbas, who arrived in Gaza last Monday, held meetings with security services and the radical Hamas and Islamic Jihad earlier this week. He was joined by Qorei and Fattuh on Thursday.

Gaza MP Ziad Abu Amr told AFP that Mazen had "concentrated the discussions on ensuring a climate of internal quiet during the Palestinian elections, whether municipal, legislative or presidential."

A presidential election to choose Arafat's successor at the helm of the Palestinian Authority is set for January 9 although no date has been set for legislative and municipal elections.

There was no talks about collecting (armed groups') weapons and Abbas did not request that the factions adopt a ceasefire," with Israel, said Amr who helped secure a truce from hardline Islamist groups during Abbas' brief tenure as prime minister in mid-2003.
