

Chinese textiles set to gain from zero quota; workers may lose

AFP, China
The Lida Silk Fashion factory stands out from the rest of the dreary industrial buildings in the Nanyou Chuangye trade zone in southern China's Shenzhen boomtown.

While piles of rubbish and general neglect despoil other workshops, this manufacturing plant in the core of China's economic heartland is clean and tidy.

Inside the brightly-lit building, some 200 workers have their heads down at sewing machines, contently making thousands of linen shirts for some of the world's best-known brand names.

It's doubtful a situation witnessed in many of the 3,000 garment plants that cram the city that sits on the Chinese border with Hong Kong.

According to general manager Shen Junyung, the fruits of a booming economy are obvious to his staff: their salaries are rising, work conditions are improving and foreign investment is flooding in.

"We have to pay higher salaries than before and also provide benefits to our workers because the foreign companies set certain standards for us to protect the workers and provide them with more comfortable working conditions," she said.

But behind these predictions of future wealth lurk some unsettling aspects of China's economic boom.

According to rights activists, times are good for textile firms here and are only likely to get better when a decades-old quota system is lifted from the world market in January with analysts predicting orders for China's low-cost, high-quality products will soar.

With the end of the Multi-Fibre Arrangement, China is expected to dominate the textile industry and, with its lower labour costs, steal massive numbers of jobs in the industry worldwide.

"Although the labour law sets a minimum wage and limited work hours and companies are required to pay overtime, no one would be able to afford it."

Baikal wins Yukos auction

REUTERS, Moscow

Baikal Finance Group, an unknown company, won an auction for Russian oil company's Yukos' core asset yesterday with a $9.4 billion bid and analysts said whomever was behind the bid enjoyed Kremlin favour.

Gazprom, which had been favoured to win but was outbid, declared it had no links to Baikal. Analysts still believed the state-controlled gas giant or other state interests may have had a hand in the winning bid for Yuganskneftegaz.

Yukos is widely seen by analysts as the victim of a Kremlin campaign to crush its politically ambitious owner, Mikhail Khodorkovsky, and seize control of strategic sectors of the economy sold off in the chaotic privatizations of the 1990s.

Khodorkovsky is now on trial for fraud and tax evasion and faces 10 years in jail if convicted.

Baikal, named after a huge Siberian freshwater lake in the heartland of Russia's oil industry, bid 260.75 billion rubles ($9.4 billion) for Yuganskneftegaz, said the sale's organizer, the Federal Property Fund.

Under Russian law the government can order a new auction or seize Yugansk in lieu of unpaid taxes if Baikal fails to pay the full amount it has bid within 14 days.

Local Interbank FX Trading

Local interbank EX market was active on Monday. Dollar closed slightly weaker against Bangladeshi taka.

Local Money Market

Money market was active. Call money rate was unchanged and ranged between 7.00 and 8.00 per cent.

International Market

The dollar edged up against the yen in thin trade on Monday, although much of the momentum from the last week's gains was lost as the market saw no end to the US currency's weakening trend. The euro rose slightly against the dollar backed by surprise upswing in German IFO institute's business climate index. As the US current account deficit has ballooned to 5.5 per cent of the size of the US economy, pressure has grown on the dollar on the view that a weaker US currency is necessary to fix the gap and the weakness is persistent well into 2005.

However, outlook for higher US interest rates could help attract funds to the US dollar denominated assets to counter the weakness to some extent.
