Since I would be turning over a new leaf, this morning I took time getting ready. What's the use of bathing with a calming and soothing gel if you are rushing against time, throwing a fit at how the clock seems to be working at thrice its normal speed? Even as I gently worked up the shampoo into a rich lather, I could feel the forgotten zing back in my life. Even before the moisturiser bottle had been opened, I felt I had attained nirvana. By the time I came out of the bath, I felt it was a new radiant me gliding on the secure belief of self-assurance. This was life! To think that I had wasted all these years...

When I finally stepped out of the room, a walking botanical park, I strutted into the lounge where The Hubby was reading a magazine and stood expectantly before him. Nothing happened. I cleared my throat and stood there again, thinking perhaps the blob of tooth gel on my toothbrush had been a bit too little for the magnet to take 'effect'. Again, nothing happened. Where were the electric sparks that were meant to spring from the tube? I had three options before me: I could, maybe, move closer to him and open my mouth wide for the charm to take effect; I could go brush my teeth a second time; or simply ignore this fiasco and move on with life. I decided on this last and most practical option. After all, no brand promises cent percent efficacy; even contraceptive pills factor in that .05 % chance of lapse.

Or was it the effect of the soothing bath gel that was countering the efficacy of the tooth gel? Or was the zesty orange shampoo up against the resilience-enhancing body lotion? I ran back to the bathroom and read through the descriptions again. The resurgent cynic in me mocked that having used them all together, I may have inflicted the most contradictory assault on my nervous system that it has ever been subjected to.

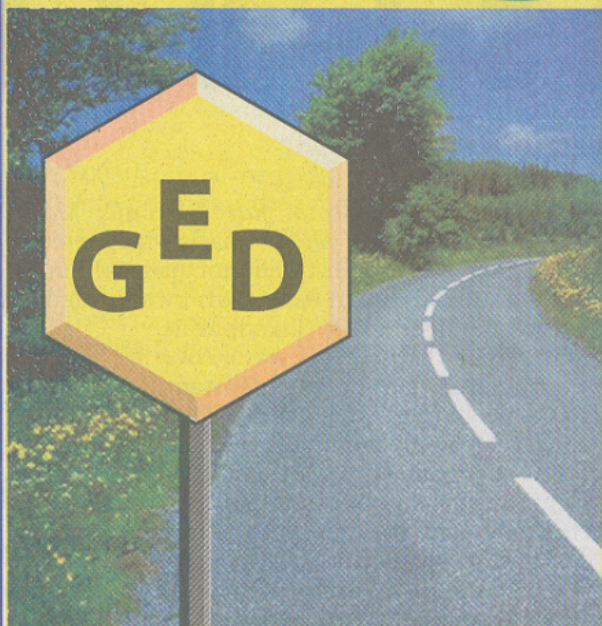

But just then, my eyes fell on the after-shave The Hubby has been using these days. It read 'For the real man. Nothing can touch you again.' So my belief stays put, strong and kicking. Next time, I have decided to pick up the other set of toiletries...yes, the ones that'll make me a beauty queen.

Thank goodness I didn't wear that perfume that seduces.
